Heredity of Character.

The passive forces seem to be more generally transmitted than the active; nature than character. Indirectly, of course, the former is largely the result of the latter, and to say that nature is more capable of hereditary transmission than character mixe, after all, bes reduced to the truism that character is more lasting in its effects when by beleading insurance companies are seri- ing repeated by succeeding generations onely thinking of entirely withdrawing it becomes nature. There is, however, Dig this fall and from the South.
