

THE RED CLOUD CHIEF

A.C. HOSMER, Proprietor

The range of modern economic life is couched with the spirit of keen commercial enterprise, characteristic of our day has brought within the domain of profitable labor the conversion of many things formerly esteemed as worthless into articles of use and value.

Even the dried castaway vegetable cans are now gathered up and metamorphosed into a tablet that yield a fair profit. There are men who make a busines of collecting all the old nests of rubbers and cast-offs that they can find and working them over into merchandise, odd others derive a profit from picking up bones and horns, which are returned upon the market in the shape of combs, bone handles and tortoise, and nothing is more common in any city than the sight of men, women and children collecting bits of paper and other kinds of refuse from ash-trays for the purpose of picking out a living from their sale.

Companies exist in several large cities which make contracts for all the sweepings of the streets, which they sift over with care, finding enough there that is valuable in them to pay ample for their trouble. Even such things as iron filings, sand and shavings, find a place in the channels of trade.

"Rags" a word that is not universally used as a synonym for other worthlessness, are really a factor of considerable importance in commerce, domestic and foreign. This is evident from the commotion caused by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, prohibiting all importations of rags for three months after the 1st of September, on account of the danger of cholera infection. The importers of rags stock protest against a general enforcement of this measure, as seriously affecting those who have charge of rags sent from foreign ports. It is asserted that there are no rags now bound for this country worth over half a million dollars, and to prohibit their landing would be disastrous to the owners.

The total importation of rags last year amounted to over 100,000 pounds, worth about $20,000. About 40,000 pounds or one-half tons of rags are used in this country yearly. They come principally from England and are used principally in the manufacture of paper, thus, in course, being made into common wrapping, the finer quality into writing paper of different sorts. Strange as it may seem, the best and most durable rags from those parts of the earth where people are poor and most degraded, are found to bring the Egyptian rags are the cleanest of all those brought over. They contain about ten per cent of cotton, and while rags from other countries average twenty or thirty per cent, and a great many are all dirt and grime. The Egyptian rags contain no grime or sand and dust, which are easily washed out. The reason of this is, the Egyptians eat very little or no meat, consequently their clothes contain no greasy impurities. The rags from Germany and England are the most filthy, and contain by far the greatest per cent of impurities. Besides, the Arabs are more cleanly in their habits than they are represented to be.

One of the most serious effects of the embargo on rags will be a rise in the price of common paper. But this is far preferable to the dread disease which it is feared the foreign rags may introduce, and the action of the Secretary under the circumstances may be a wise preventative measure.—N. Y. Observer.

A County Printer and a Post.

"Talking of minor peeps, I once had a singular patron in seat department," he said. "He would be wiser of the man, and of a charming young lady as well—a farmer's man."

"A second, too, added, we hope."

"Mildly. He was very illiterate—could only just manage to read and to write; and was past the age. I should imagine, at which much impudence was probable. But he was a sufficiently eccentric individual, if not a genuine. He called at my printing office first one Saturday evening, rather late. 'You're a printer,' he reckoned, 'he said. I replied that I had that honor. He fumbled for some seconds in the depths of a capacious grocery basket, and ultimately produced a blurred and blotched sheet of paper, which on examination, proved to contain some half dozen verses of the wildest doggerel that it was ever my lot to read, and evidently the compilation on of a love sick swain. 'What'd it cost to get this poem printed?' he asked. 'That depends, on how many copies you require!' I said. 'Copies?' he repeated. 'Only want one, of course.' As ordinally I gave him my terrier and he accepted them, and left the dusty manuscript. The next Saturday evening he called, received his previous production in all the glory of type, paid for it, and departed. A week later he returned with a second order. 'But—and he shook his head at me with a deprecating gesture—you'll have to pay again for this,' he said. 'All who want your soul should go to C. M. Storey's, the New Red Cloud grocer. He's sole agent for the celebrated Glendo Rock flour, manufactured by Columbus & Cray. Also has the well known Red Cloud mills flour, will deliver it from 90 cents upwards, will deliver free to any part of the city. See him before you buy. Also corn, oats, chaff feed or all descriptions. Don't forget the place—one door south of the skating rink.'
