With a half smile and a half sneer on his face. There was no time lost in reaching the scaffold which the condemned ascended without assistance. While his arms were being pinioned Maxwell bit his lower lip and gulped several times.

MAXWELL'S CRIME.

The crime for which Brooks, alias Maxwell was hanged was the killing of Charles Arthur Preller at the Southern Hotel, St. Louis, April 6, 1885. Hugh Mottram Brooks, that is his true name, was born in the little village of Hyde, near Manchester, England, his father being Samuel Norton Brooks, a schoolmaster, of good family. Young Brooks, shaped under the parental discipline and quiet life at Hyde, and after twenty-three years under the distasteful restraint of only occasional glimpses of the wider freedom he longed for, shipped away from home to try his luck in America. His father objected to his venturing into the great new world, and so he got his trunk away by stealth and left the parental roof at night. He made his way to Liverpool, where he first met his victim, Preller, and where he first changed his name to Maxwell—Walter Horace Lennox Maxwell was the gaudy appellation he fixed on. Charles Arthur Preller was a traveling man for London upholsterers, and he was a man of means and a luxurious habit. He and Maxwell sailed together from Liverpool on the steamer Cephalonia and on the trip became fast friends. Arriving in this country they separated, but continued to correspond. Toward the end of March, 1885, the Hyde schoolmaster's son arrived at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis, registered under his assumed name and was assigned to room 142. Preller arrived shortly afterwards and the two men, though they occupied separate rooms, were constantly together at meals, playing pool in the billiard room and lounging about the corridors. They agreed to go to Australia together, discussed the details of the trip and mapped out plans of life together when they should reach there.

On Sunday, April 6, they were seen together in room 142, but they were called away by a ring. W. K. Ross, traveling salesman, who occupied the next room, heard a man running in No. 144 that afternoon and several times heard groans. Twice that day Brooks bought chloroform of a druggist named Person. The second time he was excited and impatient, and said that he had spilled that first purchased.

That evening Brooks appeared in the dining-room, excited and distraught without his friend. He ordered a bountiful dinner, but ate very little. To the head waiter he talked wildly, told of being in Turkey, said he killed a man there once with the revolver and asked if it could get off after killing a man for $500. "Why," was the reply, "this is a civilized country. They hang murderers here."

Next day Brooks bought a trunk and handbag and two straps. He went to Hart & Duff's and asked for a hat that would make him look like a Yankee, saying his name was Tom. He was an officer in the Turkish army. He got a mouse-colored slouch hat. He went to a barber shop and had his beard shaved off and his appearance otherwise altered. Here he said his name was Maxwell and that he had taken part in the Russo-Turkish war.

The Saturday previous Brooks had tried to raise money on his watch and two Woodbury stereopticon lanterns. On this Monday morning he had plenty of money and after being shown a Maxwell and then a specimen of $5, a pair of field glasses for $25, a set of music instruments for $15, a diamond ring for $25 and a flute for $5. He also purchased an unlimited first class ticket to San Francisco for $15.

The flight to San Francisco, thence to New Zealand, the discovery of Preller's body in a trunk, the pursuit, capture, return and imprisonment of the prisoner are already well known facts.
