Health and happiness are relative conditions; at any rate, there can be little happiness without health. To give the body its full measure of strength and energy, the blood should be kept pure and vigorous by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Decorating a Grave.

A novel though realistic scene occurred at the Francis schoolhouse in Elm Creek township on Decoration day. Near the schoolhouse and near the center of the road, on a slight elevation of ground, is a grave, which heretofore has been almost unnoticed and uncared for; a slight depression in ground, one foot and a half by four, being all there was to warn the traveler that he was treading upon sacred ground, not many having known of the existence of such a grave. It seems years ago an emigrant had camped near this spot one of his children had sickened and died and there being no burial ground, at that time near here, laid his only child to rest on this little elevated mound.

Who the parents were or where they are at present no one in the vicinity seems to know; passed away perhaps which would be a sufficient cause for the neglected grave. The children attending school there were anxiously awaiting the approach of Decoration day when they might strew the lonely grave with flowers. It came, spades were secured by the little boys and flowers of every description known to Botanic science by the little girls and taken to school. The grave was nicely rounded up and pointed off and then was literally stown with flowers with an asparagus at the head and a rosebush at the foot. Then the memorial services began, with the approval of their most estimable teacher Miss Lorraine. Earnest Hines and Perry Anderson were masters of ceremonies. The scholars locked arms and then marched two by two around the grave several times, then halted and sang "Jesus keep me near the cross," then marched around the grave again, with solemn looks and trust hearts, and sang "O think of a home over there" and when about to retire to the school room one little fellow more devout, perhaps, than the rest asked in all candor "Isn't some one going to pray?" But no one of them feeling equal to the emergency, they dispersed. It was rather a sad and melancholy scene, fully illustrating the Christian spirit manifested to humanity even by little children going to school, and a glowing juvenile tribute to the little wandering emigrant buried there.
