Chas. L. Cotting, THE DRUGGIST.

FABLES.

From the Kansas Mail and Breeze.

A man who has been something of a liar in his time had a spell of reproving conscience and decided that come what would, from that time on he would speak his honest sentiments about everything that was called to his attention. He was passing the house of a neighbor whose wife was just hanging the washing out on the line. He took a careful look at the clothes and decided that they hadn't been washed with as much care as they should. He was inclined to pass on as he always had done before, but it occurred to him that here was a chance to speak his sentiments. He accordingly went up into the yard, accosted Mrs. Brown, and then proceeded to tell her that the way her clothes were washed didn't suit him and that she ought to be a lot more careful after this. Mrs. Brown is a red-headed woman and the way she lit into the man who had determined to tell the truth at all hazards was a caution to snakes. He had never had an idea that any woman could say as many mean things about another person as she said about him in about a minute and a half. She finally wound up by informing him that she would give him just three seconds by a stop clock to get out of the yard or she would set a large, low-browed bull-dog on him. He went.

He stopped in at the blacksmith shop and commenced to tell the smith that he wasn't holding the leg of a horse properly to shoe it and proceeded to give the smith considerable more free opinions along the line of the proper manner to conduct his business. The blacksmith, who was a husky man with an arm on him like the rear limb of a Missouri mule, listened without remarks for a few minutes and then threw the truth-teller out on the hard, hard ground. The fall stunned the man and the ground skinned his face quite a good deal, but he wasn't entirely discouraged. He went on determined to carry out his conscientious purpose to tell the whole truth as it occurred to him. At noon his wife met some men at the door. They were carrying the person of her husband home to his own fireside for rest and repairs. Both his eyes were closed for the week. Three of his front teeth were gone and one of the men who carried him home said as they couldn't find them near him the conclusion was that he had inadvertently swallowed them. The bridge of his nose was broken and his clothes looked as if a couple of college teams had played a few innings with him in a muddy field. When the doctor got through patching him up and had heard the story of his resolve to tell the truth, the physician, who had as much good horse sense as he had skill, remarked: "Devotion to truth, my damaged friend, doesn't compel a man to be a blamed fool."
