Engineer Temple and Fireman Rainey Meet Death. Several Passengers Are Slightly Injured.

Train number fourteen was wrecked Tuesday morning at 2:30 about two miles this side of Bostwick. Engineer Temple was killed instantly and fireman Rainey suffered a compound fracture of the right leg, was badly burned and sustained other injuries. The engine and tender went into the ditch, the baggage car hung over a fifteen-foot embankment but the other cars did not leave the track and none of the passengers were killed or injured. On account of the heavy fall of moisture during the winter this track was thoroughly soaked and safe. The railroad follows the river for a considerable distance and at the point where the wreck occurred the river curves away and when the engine struck this track it gave way. The train was not going faster than twenty-five miles an hour and the trainmen were on the lookout for danger but had received signals that all was clear. Neither the engineer nor the fireman were caught in the wreck but seemingly were hurled out as the engine toppled over. The passengers hurriedly piled out of the coaches to render any assistance within their power. A crew of men was hastily assembled in this city and taking all our physicians sped as fast as possible to the scene. They found the passengers well pleased that their escape was so complete. No one could account for the fortunate condition of affairs. Why the entire train did not plunge into the river and become buried in the quick sand and water will always remain a mystery. The wounded man was taken to his home in Wymore and hopes were expressed for his recovery. The body of engineer Temple was taken to his home and the passengers transferred to the train which was made up from Superior.

BATER—Word was received in this city that Fireman Rainey died at Wymore Tuesday night.
