Occasionally a pioneer farmer can be found who refers to early days as having been full of pleasure in the frontier neighborhoods where little houses were far apart. But E. P. Kellogg of Red Cloud, Neb., does not look at it that way. Mr. Kellogg has lived there 42 years. He recalls hauling wheat 120 miles and selling it at 40 cents a bushel. "Two weeks were required for us to go to mill with a load of grain," he said. "When I look about now and see these cattle bring such high prices, and when wheat and corn command very high prices, I cannot help recalling those early days when we were living out there in the Republican valley 120 miles from a railroad point. Going to mill that distance was a big undertaking. We can raise as much corn or wheat to the acre now as we did then."
—Kansas City Drivers Telegram, June 25th.

A Fine Rain

Monday night this section of the state received a shower of rain, sufficient to cool off the atmosphere and give renewed vigor to the crops, which could have waited a few days without serious injury. However, the refreshment was very welcome to vegetation and to men. After the exhibition of the wonderful resources of irrigated tracts in Colorado at the Tepee there was a little longing to invest in the lands of sunshine, regular climate and scientifically applied moisture. The Chief has nothing to urge against the irrigable lands of the mountain states. Doubtless there is a satisfaction in the knowledge that the weather can be relied on, and the water can be forthcoming as required. Man aspires to deal in certainties. Evidently, on the other hand, it was not intended that his life and labor should be the result of mathematical calculation, or conducted, entirely under the laws of geometry.
