WILLIAM FOX PRESENTS
THEDA BARA
IN CLEOPATRA

At the ORPHEUM

Monday-Tuesday
March 31st and April 1st

Admission, 28 and 11 cts

Time, money, people and properties were consumed with avidity by an untiring pictorial staff in the making of "Cleopatra," but the result has justified every expenditure. The picture is the supreme event in the Fox Company's career. Not only an army but a navy as well of extras have been used—some 20,000, it is estimated.

In the scene in which Theda Bara as CLEOPATRA fled from her palace at Alexandria, and surrounded by her army, waits word from the Roman Conqueror, there were used more than three thousand men, with them were one thousand horses and camels, and a vast city of multi-colored tents, pitched in the shadow of the sphinx and pyramids.

Again it took 3,000 human beings in brilliant garb to populate the huge and vivid Egyptian palace which rose in a few days in a place formerly a scene of utter desolation and a habitat of only wild duck and jackrabbits. Out of the broad expanse of water in front of the palace were floated numberless small craft built in ancient fashion with huge billowy sails and painted oars, each with its individual crew. For the royal barge alone—that of Cleopatra, magnificently decorated with banners and carvings—one hundred and fifty men were needed—far more than the crew of a modern torpedo destroyer. Manning the battle craft, which took a small army of workmen to build were five thousand men, divided among the followers of Cleopatra and Octavius Caesar. Over four thousand people were used in the scenes in Rome, the settings of which took weeks to construct. Although the actual filming was only a day's work, the cost for it came well around $15,000.
