Paving Case in Supreme Court

The paving troubles of the city of Red Cloud were aired in supreme court Thursday, says the State Journal the last of the week. A number of property owners in a district that the mayor and council decided should be improved are fighting to the death of any assessment of the costs against them. They have a long list of legal reasons or arguments. They imply that in spite of the law and the opposition of property owners the council jammed the paving down their metaphorical throats. They claim that the council did not follow the law, that it ignored the city engineer and went out and hired Grant & Fulton of Lincoln and then let the contract to a Lincoln firm without any competition. As another reason why they should not pay they said that in buying the cost no charge was made against the street railway, its owner, Raymond W. Koontz, being a member of the council, at that time.

The paving row was apparently a very lively one. At one time the protestants used the newspapers to warn the council that they must expect a fight. "We mean what we say. Don't believe anything different," was a part of the warning.

The city won in the court below, and its attorneys made considerable sport over the dragging in of the street car line. It was built many years ago, to connect Red Cloud with the station under the hill a long distance away where the railroad ran. It did not pay, and has since been abandoned. Its owner did not consider it worth while to put in heavy rails after the paving was put down. He got a set of wheels for the car that would permit it to run on broad tires while the car was crossing the paving, and then drop back onto the ordinary tread where the rails joined the end of the paving. The city attorney thus treated the street car incident:

"Objection 6 is somewhat surprising. It is true there was in Red Cloud a street railway, which was operated more from romance than for any other reason. It was operated without a franchise and existed only by sufferance. It was purchased by the then owner for the extravagant sum of $375.00. This included the two cars. The substantial character of its track, and the impermanence of its existence, may have occasioned it to be overlooked. In any event, when the pavement was put down, it was found that the rails were too light and small to be built into the pavement. The track was therefore taken up, and the distinctive feature of the city's claim to notoriety was abandoned.

"It is hardly presumable that the statute would impose upon the owner of this street car line, who had no franchise, the burden of building a new line, and operating it at a loss to meet the exigencies of the pavement. But if the law required this, it is no defense to these plaintiffs, and no justification for them to refuse to pay the portion that might be assessed against their lots. When they brought their injunction, they did not object that the street line was not to be assessed its proper amount, but they objected to any assessment at all. If the street car line were to be assessed it would be assessed at the meeting the plaintiffs sought to enjoin. Had the plaintiffs seriously desired that the owner of the street railway company should be charged with the expense of paving between the tracks they should have permitted the board to act in the matter of equalization.

"Again, no one of the plaintiffs, by testimony or otherwise showed to the trial court that his assessment would be higher because of the abandonment of the street railway. For aught the proof shows, the street railway track was in front of the property of others than the plaintiffs.

"Council are hardly justified in their insinuation against the dead owner of the street railway. It is true that, by abandoning his railway, he escaped the burden of changing the rails and paying a portion of the assessment. He was the owner of six lots which bear their portion of the assessment. He probably regretted, as did most of the people of the city, that the street railway must be abandoned. But if its abandonment was necessary, all questions relating to the street railway are out of this case."
