WHY?

DOES SILVER TARNISH

THE tarnishing or dulling of the bright surface of silver is due to the action of air which contains sulphur, even in minute quantities. This action, which is somewhat analogous to the rusting of iron—though the latter is due to the effect of water or moisture—forms a coating of silver sulphate over the bright surface of the metal, in some cases turning it an unsightly brown. The film of silver sulphate may be removed by the application of friction but, unless care is exercised, this is likely to scratch and mar the original surface of the metal. For this reason, all reliable preparations sold as "silver polishes" are entirely free from gritty particles large enough to make scratches visible to the naked eye—though the entire process of polishing is, in itself, one of scratching away the film or removing it by some kind of friction. The fact that sulphur is responsible for the tarnishing of silver explains why pieces of tableware in a house heated by a hot-air furnace will tarnish more rapidly than those in a house where steam or hot-water heat has been installed. The sulphur fumes come up from the furnace through the registers and quickly film the silver, necessitating frequent cleaning, while the condition naturally does not exist in houses where radiators are in place.

First American Piano.

Evidence seems to prove that the piano was invented by Bartolomeo Cristofori, a harpsichord maker of Padua in 1710. A half century later pianos were manufactured in England by German mechanics. The first American piano was made in Boston in 1822 by a firm that has continued to make that instrument for a hundred years.

Romans First Pleasure Tourists.

Traveling for pleasure came into vogue in the peaceful years of the Roman empire, says the Scientific American. Historic places and natural curiosities were sought out and famous groves and gardens visited. The Romans seemed to have preferred these gentler aspects of nature, and had little appreciation of towering heights and plunging canyons.
