

Matrimonial Adventures

Peachblow A Marital Extravaganza BY Rupert Hughes

Author of "Souls for Sale," "Beauty," "The Gift Wife," "Miss Big," "The Amiable Crimes of Dick Mending," "The Old Nest," "What Will People Say?," "Empty Pockets," "Tess of the Storm Country," etc.

Copyright by United Feature Syndicate

RUPERT HUGHES

I first met Rupert Hughes several years ago. I sat next to him at a dinner. Mr. Hughes was then, as now, very much in the limelight. But Mr. Hughes did not talk at all about his own work. He asked me about mine, and told of how, once, when he was an editor, he had cut an author's story in a moment of stress to fill an exacting space, and how a newspaper had minded. His feeling still, though this had happened years before, was one of real regret for that author's chagrin.

It is that quality of understanding the other fellow's feelings that gives him such a large hold on the American public.

I asked him last winter when he first began to write, and he said at the age of seven and that he had been at it ever since. A short time after he left Yale he had six months' experience on a newspaper. After that he had been an editor on various magazines until a little more than ten years ago, but that during those editorial years he had done a great amount of writing at night.

His output has been enormous. It is impossible to chronicle all of his successes in short stories, novels, plays and moving pictures. He is also the author of a musical encyclopedia. It seems incredible that one man could do so much! And yet he was intensely interested in the idea of the Star Author Series of Matrimonial Adventures and at once agreed to write the story that follows.

"Peachblow" is an extravaganza on marriage. It has, none the less, an underlying suggestion for both husbands and wives. MARY STEWART CUTTING, JR.

Even if it had not been set down in Holy Writ for a fact, there would be no escaping the truth of: "To him that hath, it shall be given." In our dictionary "him" of course, includes "her." Which is more than he is able to do outside the dictionary. This is a bit of a story of a her that had—and therefore got.

The Lord himself, they say, was surprised when he saw her. Her earthly father was so stunned with pride that he called her "Peachblow." And with good reason. She was born just about the time when the Peachblow vase was exciting the world.

The unknown genius who was the author of that masterpiece never dreamed when he put it in the fire that it would come out so wonderful. And so the mysterious Potter who places souls in the furnace of human bodies was enchanted and amazed by the curious, unforeseen, unintended beauty of this girl when she was born. They had selected the name of Ellen Anne Green for her before they saw her, but afterward they called her Peachblow.

Such a peculiar luster she had, with the glow of a glaze, yet the aura of a mist, that the Potter longed to show her how he loved her by endowing her with some intentional gift surpassing even the fortuitous charm she brought with her out of the kiln of destiny.

So he gave her a power He had never even granted Himself—that of annulling what had been and making it as if it had been. He authorized her and empowered her to change her mind and try again from the start! She could rub out the past and do it over again!

She learned of her awful power only by accident and not until she had passed through the animal whims of childhood, and the parent-obeying, teacher-obeying custom-obeying years. Then she found herself in the world of grown-up women. They were thinking of matrimony.

Some were not married and wanted to be, but dreaded it and could not find a satisfactory mate. Mates were admirable, adorable or advisable, but rarely all three at once. The women who were married seemed to be forever pointing out what martyrs they were and how well they stood it; or else were longing to try a new form of martyrdom with somebody else.

Peachblow longed for the joys, the sorrows, the burdens of home. She wanted to do her share in the world; to multiply, and all that sort of thing. "Love is so glorious a thing that I think I'd like to be loved by the loveliest lover in all the world."

She cast about for the person most worthy of that distinction. The man who seemed to be the leading lover in respect to quantity and quality was known to all the world as Claude Winsor. So she said: "I think I'll marry Claude Winsor."

Her father and mother exclaimed aloud: "But he's a movie actor and he's married."

"The first argues skill," she mused; "but the second is an obstacle. I do wish he had never been married."

There was an audible click and buzz, a peculiar jolt in the universe, and dizziness as if someone had thrown the world into the reverse gear, then set it back in high. The family said: "That's funny! Did you notice anything?"

Then they forgot it and returned to the popular sport of denouncing the motion picture people and crediting them with inventing more novel sins than situations.

Peachblow was blue for several days, and then she chanced to read, in the newspapers, this: "Mr. and Mrs. Claude Winsor announce that a curious error has been made in the public attitude toward their relationship."

"They have never been married; never have lived together, never have been anything but friends, which they still are, and might not be if they had been married."

"The children that used to play in front of their bungalow are the children of a neighbor."

"Ah!" quoth Peachblow. "I will marry this bachelor." And immediately began to pack her trunks. She told her father to get her a stateroom to Los Angeles and her mother to come along.

Her parents indulged in mental pinwheels when they heard her decision. But nothing could change Peachblow's mind. She went out to Los Angeles, and sent one of her photographs to Mr. Winsor with a request for an interview. That photograph was letter of introduction enough, and she was invited to call at the great man's studio.

When she stood before his eyes, he said: "Do you want to go into the movies?"

"Well," she said, "I'm going to marry into them."

"Indeed? And who is the lucky man?"

"You."

"Really?"

"Uh-huh."

Being used to the silent drama and hating superfluous titles, he said nothing, but took her by an elbow, her mother by an elbow, hurried them out to his car, ran them to the nearest parson and said "Shoot!"

For a time the marriage was happy and she revelled in the luxury of being loved by an expert. But then he went back to his profession, and mortification set in.

Peachblow found herself the chattel of a husband who left her arms early in the morning and hastened to the arms of other women; who fought for them, pursued them, risked his life to save their lives, gazed into their eyes with an ardor that transfixed all beholders; who faded out of every picture with a dying duck look of undying affection for some highly artificial beauty—and then came home at night worn out with love and wanted to go to the American Legion prize-fight.

After a few months Peachblow sent for her mother and father and listened to their "I told you so's" with great patience.

They agreed with her that life with such a husband was impossible and engaged the best divorce lawyer in Los Angeles. While they were bewailing the inevitable newspaper horror, the headlines, and all the hideous details of divorce, Peachblow felt a renewal of her occult power.

"Divorce nothing!" she said; "I'll just forget him. I'll just unmarry myself quietly, and erase my memory from his mind."

She said this in the very presence of Mr. Winsor who had called with his lawyer to confer with Peachblow, her parents and their lawyer, John Elphinstone.

As soon as Peachblow spoke, a curious look came over Claude Winsor's face. Again the earth jolted and spun backward, then raced forward once more.

"It's nothing," said Mr. Elphinstone, "but one of our little California earthquakes. Quite nothing at all."

He slipped his arm about Peachblow to sustain her, and found the attitude singularly comfortable. Together they watched Claude Winsor staring at them with a look of bewilderment. Then he bowed and said: "Pardon me, I entered the wrong set—house, by mistake."

He staggered out and the next thing he knew he was sitting on his porch dandling his baby before his original wife while the publicity man took snapshots for the magazines.

Mr. Elphinstone clung to Peachblow until her father intervened and said: "What right have you to stand there embracing my daughter as if you were announcing your engagement to her?"

"And why not?" said Elphinstone. "I see no objection," murmured Peachblow who felt a sudden emptiness in her life. "After all, who could make a better husband than a lawyer?"

And so in a short time expensively engraved cards conveyed the information that Mr. and Mrs. Greene announced the marriage of their daughter Ellen Anne to John Elphinstone, Esquire.

Those who have experienced it, say that there is nothing like being the wife of a lawyer. For a time Peachblow agreed with this in its simplest implication; then she amended it to: "There's nothing like it because nothing else could be so bad."

She had a husband who tore himself from her society of mornings and went forth to do battle for women clients over whose wrecked lives he waxed so eloquent that his tears were rivalled by those of the jury and strong judges bent their heads and wept secretly on the papers where judges make idle marks to pass away the time.

Elphinstone not only spent hours upon hours in his office with exquisite clients whose hands he patted, and whose charms he expatiated on before the courts, but he came home and told his wife about it.

He wrote briefs as impassioned and as full of imagination as any scenario and then acted his own contentions with fiery enthusiasm. His cases often took him to distant cities and it was not always convenient for Peachblow to go with him.

There was such a strain upon her natural jealousy that she had to consult a physician, Dr. S. Q. Laptus, who had a charming bedside manner and soothed her by suggestion rather than by knife or nostrum.

After one notorious lawsuit in which Elphinstone wore himself almost to a wreck by his defense of a wayward lady who had bankrupted her husband and then sued him for alienation of her affections, Elphinstone came home to find his mother and father-in-law and the physician trying to restrain Peachblow's hysterics. When Elphinstone approached her solicitously she covered into the bosom of the doctor and screamed: "Go away; you are no longer a husband of mine; in fact, you never were."

Elphinstone was seized by invisible hands and haled backward to his own office where he awoke with a splitting headache and a strange gap in his memory.

Peachblow, once more miraculously restored to maidenhood, said: "After all, a doctor is the world's most useful citizen. I believe I should enjoy being a wife to one."

"Barkis is willin'," said the physician, who was unusually well read for a doctor. He persuaded another physician to take care of his patients and went away on a bridal tour of all imaginable bliss.

When he came back Doctor Laptus found that his overworked substitute had let his patients get well, and he had to buckle down to the task of restoring them to a state of profitable disorder.

He had his office in the parlor of the home and this made it necessary for Mrs. Peachblow Laptus to entertain her friends in the upstairs living room.

The acoustics were such that she could hear what went on in the office. The latest and heartiest women constantly entered the parlor in a state of acute distress and after long murmurous consultations went away so much better that Peachblow grew frantic with suspicion. She remembered all too vividly how gentle and soothing her husband had been with her when she was another man's wife. And she wondered, till her wonderment grew to be a bitter conviction.

Worse yet, he was the slave of the telephone. At no hour of the day or night was he safe from the hateful summons to hurry to the rescue of some distressful patient. In nine cases out of ten it was a woman, and in no cases out of ten was Peachblow ever urged to come along.

She so lost her taste for material medicines that she longed for spiritual help, and went to her rector, dear Dr. Clarence Yost, to confess her misery.

She was set upon a divorce, but he was horrified at the thought. "Now an annulment would not be so bad," he urged.

"All right, it's annulled," said Peachblow grimly.

And Doctor Laptus found himself back in bachelorhood. But Peachblow had come to depend upon Doctor Yost. He lived in such an exalted sphere and such a comfortable parsonage that she decided to share both with him.

To her intense confusion Peachblow discovered that the feminine portion of the congregation took her marriage to their dear rector as a personal invasion of their rights.

For a time the attendance fell off noticeably. But gradually the lonely women returned to their pews. Next they resumed their habits of bringing their woes to their spiritual adviser.

These were genuine woes beyond the reach of scarp or tonic, but Peachblow could not regard them as anything but a hypocritical excuse for weeping on her husband's shoulder and clinging to his rescuing hands.

Whether or not she did the women a cruel injustice, the effect on her nerves was manifest. At last in a crisis of unhappiness, she stormed: "I'm sick of all the professions. I'm going into trade."

She unwished herself from Doctor Yost and he once more assumed all the charms of an unwedded clergyman, eligible and available.

A merchant was Peachblow's next first husband; handsome Junior member of the firm of Wanfield & Son, at whose great department store she had long run up bills for her father to protest against and pay.

But when she called at his office she found him so surrounded with stenographers, buyers, mannings, cloak models, designers and other women customers and aides that she could hardly get to him.

His heart was given to providing as many women as possible with beautiful garments and embellishments of every intimate sort, with perfumes and ribbons and lipsticks and what not. He thought about fashions and he was so weary of feminine charms and their enchantment that when he came home to his Peachblow he left at once for one of his exclusively male clubs in order to keep his sanity.

A small shoe shop man was Peachblow's next experiment. But when she went by his store and peered in at the window, she always found him kneeling before some woman, or trying to crush a No. 6-E foot into a No. 4-A shoe; and she simply could not endure it.

A plumber she married was forever putting about other people's homes in the most personal crannies; and she gave him up.

An ice-man followed him through her much-trodden heart, but he, too, had his kitchen doors to visit.

Discouraged by her inability to find a husband in town who did not have to spend a large part of his time and attention upon other women, Peachblow resolved to marry some homely old farmer who lived in a solitude.

Esra Hepple was the happy man—for a time. And he was so content with Peachblow's society that he would not even keep a hired girl to cook for the five men.

He rose at 4 a. m. and bragged about it. He woke her up to brag about it. The fact that he had gone to sleep at dusk did not abate his pride. The only poetry he knew was something ending with "healthy, wealthy and wise." She knew he was neither wealthy nor wise, but she was afraid he was healthy.

Her jealous little soul had its wish at last. But a wish ceases to be a wish as soon as it is achieved. Like the candy in the bombon dish it is apt not only to turn sour but to wreck the appetite as well.

Peachblow's latest installment in her serial husband never cast an interested eye on any other woman. But this curiosity made his interest in her unimportant; robbed him of suspense and her of the drama of anxiety. He was unskillful, uncouth, illiterate in femininity.

No other woman cast an eye in his direction. But that was because he had nothing attractive about him. And the man who is unable to interest any other woman is unable to interest his wife.

Poor Peachblow, having no rivals to fear and having a husband who made no perilous comparisons, began to neglect herself. Her beauty wilted from lack of attention. Her incomparable complexion began to yield to farm food and farm labor in farm weather.

She sighed: "It doesn't seem to make much difference what man a woman marries; every one of the brutes has his own specialty in being impossible."

By this time Peachblow had so disorganized the machinery of the universe, that the world was in the garage half the time; and all the angels exhausted.

It is not such an easy matter for even the angels to keep everything going, especially when it goes backward frequently. There was talk of a strike in heaven and celestial society was profoundly disturbed. The oldest angels were forever talking of the last big revolution when Lucifer and his whole party were thrown overboard.

But how was the dreadful situation to be changed? The Lord did not want to cancel one of his own generous gifts to one of his most beautiful creatures. But heaven was consoled to be heaven for all its deserving tenants.

At the height of this dreadful cosmic crisis Peachblow in a frenzy state of despondency, while slaving in her kitchen, chanced to catch a glimpse of herself in the casual mirror in the round bottom of a big dishpan. She had long ceased to consult her own looking-glass.

The vision that stared at her from that tiny surface shocked her into a sorrow too deep for hysterics. She meditated on her own image:

"Every husband is worse than every other husband. A woman might as well stick to the first wretch she happens to marry. I was luckiest when I had the most lovable of men, and I wish I had him back again, movie actor though he be."

"This hateful power of mine has been my ruin. It's best to let nature take her course. The one thing I most wish had never been is my ability to make things as if they never had been."

As she exhaled this last sigh, a distinct earthquake was registered on every seismograph in the world. The heavens shook, at first with surprise, then with delight.

Peachblow herself was shaken. She found herself staring at a dishpan as if under a hypnotic spell. She heard her husband's voice from the dining-room door. It was the voice of Claude Winsor, the star surprise of the cinematic fragment. The world might share his silent beauty with her, but his voice belonged to her:

"What on earth are you doing in the kitchen, my darling? It's no place for such exquisite grace. And besides I see that there's a ton of fat-meat that you haven't answered. You haven't autographed any of my photographs for me in ever so long. We've got to get busy or we'll lose our little public."

With a cry of rapture she flung her arms about his universally admired neck and rejoiced in the fact that at least a hundred million women of all ages and races about the globe would have been glad to poison her for her enviable privilege.

The moral, if any, has to do with leaping out of the frying pan into the fire. The moral is ancient; the fire is the same old inextinguishable blaze of discontent. But the frying pan is forever new. Each one of us furnishes his or her own frying pan. Selah!

Your New Home should be made artistic, sanitary and livable. These walls should be Alabastined in the latest, up-to-the-minute nature color tints. Each room should reflect your own individuality and the treatment throughout be a complete perfect harmony in colors.

The walls of the old home, whether mansion or cottage, can be made just as attractive, just as sanitary, through the intelligent use of

Alabastine

Instead of kalsomine or wallpaper

It is absolutely necessary if you expect Alabastine results that you ask for and secure Alabastine.

Avoid kalsomines under various names and insist on the package with the cross and circle printed in red. That is the only way to be sure you are getting the genuine Alabastine.

Alabastine is easy to mix and apply, lasting in its results, and absolutely sanitary.

Alabastine is a dry powder, put up in five-pound packages, white and beautiful tints, ready to mix and use by the addition of cold water, and with full directions on each package. Every package of genuine Alabastine has cross and circle printed in red.

Better write us for hand-made color designs and special suggestions. Give us your decorative problems and let us help you work them out.

Alabastine Company 1655 Grandville Ave. Grand Rapids, Mich

Plant Growth and Sunlight. Recent experiments show that the amount of light that a plant has affects its growth fully as much as climate. The iris, for example, which ordinarily blooms in May or June, would not bloom under hothouse conditions in winter until its period of daily light was artificially lengthened by six hours. The October chrysanthemum was made to bloom in midsummer by shortening the daily light period; lettuce by the same means was held in the rosette stage for a long time; and the radish, with only seven hours of daylight, grew for more than a year before it finally shot up its flower stem and died.—Youth's Companion.

Wireless Supervision. A bill has been introduced in Washington which provides that the Department of Commerce shall have supervision over all radio communication, assigning wave lengths, approving apparatus, licensing operators and otherwise supervising wireless communication to bring order out of the present chaos of jazz bands, sermons, crop reports, sporting services, concerts and what-not running simultaneously on the same wave lengths.

No ugly, grimy streaks on the clothes when Red Cross Ball Blue is used. Good bluing gets good results. All grocers carry it.—Advertisement.

He's Air Right! She—Do you prefer blondes or brunettes? He—Yes, dear!—Life.

Find What CANADA has to offer YOU! If your dream of success seems like a hopeless ambition, if you are discouraged trying to get ahead on high priced land, if your present location fails to give you opportunity, there is a new deal for you, a new chance in the fertile, virgin farms of Western Canada, where wheat produces 20 to 40 bushels to the acre, where the 1922 crop was biggest in history, where oats, barley and hay and fodder crops are the basis of a great dairy industry, and a man's work brings him success and prosperity.

Low Priced Land—the Last Great West In Western Canada you still can buy virgin prairie land at $15 to $20 per acre, on long terms if desired, near to town, railroads, etc.—land such as has for many years produced the world's prize winning wheat, oats, barley, flax, rye alfalfa. Canada has no "war time" land boom; prices are not inflated—you get in on the ground floor.

Taxes Favor the Farmer as Values Increase The tax laws of Western Canada encourage the producing farmer. The tax on land is reduced when it is brought under cultivation—while on your buildings, machinery, improvements, personal property, automobile, there is no tax at all. A single crop is often worth more, acre for acre, than the cost of the land.

Rent Now—Buy Later Pay Out of Profits Canada welcomes the industrious settler. What you have now isn't so important. If your capital is small, or you cannot sell your present holdings to advantage, rent a fertile Canadian farm and "try it out" for a season or two. Make a good living, increase your capital, and buy later. Farms may be rented from successful settlers on easy terms; in some cases with option of purchase.

Buy on Exceptional Terms—32 Years to Pay For the benefit of those wishing to buy land a national non-profit sharing organization—the Canada Colonization Association—has been established with head office at Winnipeg, and United States office at St. Paul. This Association offers selected land convenient to railways—much of it at $15 to $20 per acre—on very small cash payment; no further payment until third year; balance extended over thirty years, but purchaser may pay up and obtain title at any time if desired. Interest six percent per annum on deferred payments.

We Help Find Your Opportunity The Canadian Government maintains information bureaus in leading American centers, where you can get full information, without cost, about all parts of Canada. The men in charge are Government officials, interested only in the service of the prospective settler.

Get the Facts—No Cost MAIL THE COUPON. Let us know something of your position, and receive free book with maps, and free service of the Canadian Government Agent in your territory; also information how special railway rates can be arranged for a trip of inspection.

FREE HOMESTEADS are still available in some localities. Canada welcomes tourists—come and see our country for yourself.

10c Changes Last Year's Frock to New Putnam Fadeless Dyes—dyes or tints as you wish