My Marriage Problems

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of "REVELATIONS OF A WIFE"

The Explanation Mother Graham Demanded from Katie and Received from Lillian. We were not left long in doubt as to the identity of the person knocking on the door of the library.

Lillian's eyes swept the room, then she pointed to a dark recess beneath a desk. I summoned Mother Graham's hat into its costly bandbox, put on the cover, and slipped the box into the place she had indicated.

My father moved toward the door, watching me as he went. When I had concealed the box and was standing erect again, he opened the door.

My mother-in-law, majestic in spite of her bathrobe and slippers—strode into the room, her hand gripping Katie's arm as she brought the girl into the room with her by a series of low, unceremonious being determined that no movement of her own should assist the older woman's progress.

"Margaret!" Mother Graham began, her voice choking with anger. "This thing has about reached the limit! You're going to fire this girl or I'm going to leave your roof forever. I've stood everything, but when it comes to her coming into my room while I'm asleep, and stealing my best hat while I'm asleep—oh! you needn't look so astonished. I just the same as caught her at it just now. I wakened out of a sound sleep and heard somebody closing my door. At first, dazed, I didn't realize what it meant, then when I saw her in my room, I guessed that this act had—"

"Katie's composure had broken suddenly. 'Don't you dare to call me outside mine own name, you—' I took a step toward her, and she stopped speaking, although her eyes flashed venomously at my angry mother-in-law, and with a swift little movement she twisted herself away from the elder woman's grasp, backed to the rear of the room and stood there at bay.

"You mean—?" I think Lillian had waited only for this last assurance before speaking. At any rate, the words had hardly left my mouth, when she turned before Lillian had crossed to her and was looking intently into her eyes.

"Dear Mother Graham," she said earnestly, there are reasons why I do not wish Katie to remain here while you receive the explanation to which you mean to insist concerning your hat. Will you take my word that I know what happened to the bandbox, and that Katie did not take it from your room? Then we can send her to her room.

Into Mother Graham's face crept a look of delighted comprehension. "That is what has something to do with—"

"Exactly," returned Lillian. "Then you may go to bed." She turned magnificently to Katie. "And maybe this will cure you of snooping around. I never would have suspected you if you weren't always so meddlesome.

I suspect it took all of Katie's loyalty to me to remain silent, but with my eyes upon hers she uttered no word, but walked out of the room with a dignity almost as royal as Mother Graham's own.

Lillian signed to Allen Drake to close the door after her, then placed a chair for Mother Graham, and waited until we were all seated before she spoke. "I suspected that she was, in Dicky's parlance, 'stalling for time' until she should have perfected her story.

"We have taken a great liberty with you, Mother Graham," Lillian began depreciatingly, "but really, it seemed as if we could do nothing else. It became necessary to secrete a certain paper in a place where no one would ever think of looking for it. After long deliberation, the covering of your best hat was selected. Tonight we wished to submit the paper to Mr. Spencer, and, therefore Madge went to your room and took the box out. We have it here, and I am sure you will see that but for a rip in a seam, which Madge can sew up again without anyone's noticing that it has been disturbed, it has not been hurt in the least. Here it is."
