

Married Life of Helen and Warren

An Outlawed Guest Invades Their Room in a Exclusive Philadelphia Hotel.

"Dear, look at that head waiter—he's talking about us! He keeps glancing toward our table."

"Maybe it's my fatal beauty," grinned Warren as he dipped into the still simmering rarebit. "Jove, this is hot! Want some on your sandwich? Dishing up a forkful of the melted cheese."

"No, it's a deadly thing to eat at night. I wouldn't eat it all—you had such a heavy dinner, and that's so indigestible," worried Helen, who did not approve of this after theater supper.

It was their second day in Philadelphia where Warren was attending a business conference. And as always when in another city, he had insisted on "taking in a show" and a supper afterwards.

A good rarebit never hurts me. That's not a bad thing to be indigestible. Wonder if they've got any Harvey sauce here?"

"Dear, they ARE talking about us!" now nervously apprehensive. That's the manager with him. Something must be wrong."

"They're talking about skip our hotel bill" with a chuckle, wrapping the rosy cheese about his fork.

"Is this Mr. Curtis?" The manager now approached their table.

"It is."

"Sorry, sir, but we never allow dogs in the rooms. Strictly against the rules."

"That's interesting. But just how does it concern me?"

"It concerns that dog you've smuggled up to your room," he added. "It can't stay there!"

"You've got the wrong party," shrugged Warren. "I haven't any dog."

"You're Mr. W. E. Curtis—and you have room 839?"

"Correct," admitted Warren. "But I don't happen to have a dog."

"I'm sorry, Mr. Curtis, but you can't put that over. You must keep that dog in the basement—or we'll have to ask you for your room."

"Here, what's the matter with you?" Warren was losing his temper. "I tell you I haven't any dog in this hotel or anywhere else."

"There's no use denying it, Mr. Curtis. That dog's been barking for the last hour, disturbing everybody on that floor."

"There's some mistake," began Helen hastily. "I assure you we haven't."

"Now, I'll attend to this," Warren cut her short. "We'll give up your room, all right," throwing down his napkin. "This isn't the only hotel in Philadelphia. I don't know what you game is—but here's where we get out. Have my bill made up!"

Crimson with embarrassment, Helen felt they were the cynosure of all eyes as they hurried after Warren, who was stalking wrathfully toward the door.

"It isn't necessary to leave, sir," the manager followed them into the elevator. "Just send that dog down to the night watchman."

"Dog?" fumed Warren. "If I had a dog here—you think I'd lie about it?"

"You can hear it barking now!" was the triumphant retort as they stepped off at the eighth floor.

"May be a dozen dogs on this floor for all I know. I said there wasn't any in my room."

But as they neared "839" the barking louder. At the door Helen, who had darted ahead, stopped petrified. The barks were unmistakably from within.

"Holy smoke!" exploded Warren as he flung open the door.

On a chair stood a wicker hamper, from which came the sharp, whining yelp.

"It's not your dog?" the manager was staring at their blank faces.

"That's what I've been trying to imply," grunted Warren. "How in blazes did it get here?"

"It's cruel to keep it shut up!" Helen was trying to open the basket. As she threw back the lid a tiny Pekingese leaped out, yelping joyously.

"Oh, it's a darling!" cuddling it in her arms, as frantic at its release, it tried to lick her face.

"Who the Sam Hill wished this on us?" Warren examined the tag on the basket. The writing was plain, "Curtis, Room 839." "Well that stumps me!"

"Dear, maybe someone gave it to us," suggested Helen eagerly.

"Fat chance of that! Who do we know in Philadelphia that'd give us a dog?" Then turning on the now puzzled manager: "How'd it get in this room?"

"The doorman saw the chauffer slip one of the bellboys a dollar as he gave him the basket. That boy's off duty now, but he must have put it in the wrong room."

"Anybody else registered here by the name of Curtis?" asked Warren.

"Not that I know of—I'll have it looked up at once. I'm very sorry this happened. Mr. Curtis, but we've had so many dogs smuggled in lately—we have to be strict. And of course we thought it was your dog."

"That's all right, shrugged Warren. "Naturally you would think that."

"Must he go down in the basement? Maybe he's hungry," anxiously Helen.

"I'll have him fed," the manager was forcing the squirming ball of fur back into the basket. Then at the door, "Shall I order you another rarebit, Mr. Curtis. Afraid you didn't get much of that one."

"No, it's too late. I won't bother with it now."

Reiterating his regrets for the whole occurrence the manager bowed himself out.

"Well, what'd you know about that?" Warren had peeled off his coat and was struggling with his collar. "No wonder he stuck to his guns."

"Whoever it belongs to must be sick. It was such a dear."

"That feisty little dish mop?"

"Why, Warren, I thought you loved dogs!"

"I do—real dogs. But I loathe those hairy cockroaches."

"Ah, it was awfully cunning! I hope they won't keep it in that basket."

"Huh! That dog'll make himself heard. No wonder the management was riled—yelping its head off up here. Enough to rouse the whole floor."

"Dear, I don't think they ought to be (Continued on Page Five)
