

Marriage of Barry Wicklow

"I think you'll soon get tired of living down here," she said, suddenly. "It's a very monotonous life. We do the same things day after day—get up at the same time, have meals at the same time, feed the animals, cook and wash up, and go to bed at the same time. The only really exciting thing in the week is market day, and then we all go into Bedmund." She laughed at his interested face. "And Bedmund is so tiny you would probably be able to walk all round it in a quarter of an hour. We will try, shall we?" he suggested, quickly.

"She laughed and shook her head. "It's a very busy day for me. I help Uncle Joe."

"And do you like living here?" she hesitated. "I suppose I do, but I don't know. I've lived here all my life, and nobody has ever been so good to me as Uncle Joe. When my father died, mother and I hadn't anything at all, and he just came and letched us over here to the farm, and we've been here ever since. It's a little bit like a 'But all the same,' she said, with sudden change of tone. "I should love—just love to be able to live in London."

"Perhaps you will, when you are married," Barry said, rather shortly, as if he did not wish the subject pursued.

Barry stood beside her in silence for a moment. "You have friends in town, of course," he said then.

Again there was the faintest perceptible pause before she answered him. "I know one or two people there; yes."

Apparently she was not going to satisfy his curiosity. Barry frowned. He tried to recall what was his uncle had said about this girl—that she was most undesirable! Yes, that had been one of the many preposterous things. He looked down at her with a little frown in his eyes. The old fool did not know what he was talking about. Who in the wide world could have been responsible for such a statement? He frowned fiercely as he looked out across the fast-graying landscape.

Hazel was watching him. "How cross you look!" she said, with a little hint of laughter in her voice. "Whatever are you thinking about?"

"I was wondering," Barry answered abruptly, "whether I should tell you something, or whether—"

He turned and looked at her. "I think, perhaps, it will keep," he added, in another tone.

"She did not question him, and they turned towards the house."

"I don't know what you are going to do with yourself all day," she said, presently. "I am quite sure that you don't really care for long walks, in spite of what you said to Uncle Joe."

Barry declared that he did; he said that he thought the country was ripping. "And I shall ask your uncle to take me round the farm with him," he added.

She laughed at that. "Uncle Joe would walk you off your feet in the morning," she declared. "He's so strong—he never gets tired."

"And don't you think I am strong?" Barry demanded, with pretended deference.

She raised her pretty eyes, and dropped them again quickly. "I'm sure I don't know," she said, rather indifferently.

They had reached the house again now, and she went away, leaving him standing in the doorway.

Barry looked after her with a comical sort of dismay in his eyes; then he wandered into the sitting-room.

There was nobody there, and he sat down on the arm of an old-fashioned grandfather chair, and stared moodily at the floor.

He was conscious of a miserable indecision—should he go or should he stay? He did not want to stay, of blackberries on her arm and laughed.

"Whatever makes you think that?" she asked. "Not like you! Why, of course he does."

Barry shook his head. "He doesn't. I don't know why, but I've got a firm sort of conviction in my mind that he looks upon me with suspicion."

His eyes twinkled. "Perhaps he thinks I've got designs on some of his property," he suggested. "And perhaps I have," he added, coolly.

Hazel laughed again.

"The copper warming pan, for instance!" she said. "I heard you admiring it the other day. It isn't a bit valuable, I assure you."

Barry's eyes grew suddenly grave. "Mr. Daniels has other possessions that are, though," he said.

"Others?" She looked at him, not understanding.

"Barry was looking at her steadily. "Perhaps I should have said—one other." He amended his words deliberately.

It was impossible now to mistake his meaning. Hazel made a little grimace.

"If you've quite finished paying me compliments," she said, trying to speak lightly, "I think we had better go home. The basket is quite full; if we put any more in they'll only be spilt."

Barry took the basket from her arm. They walked a few steps in silence.

"Why will you never be serious with me?" he asked her suddenly. "I am beginning to think that you are like Mr. Daniels, and don't altogether trust me," he added, with a tinge of impatience in his voice.

Barry had been at Grove Farm four days now, and already London seemed far away, so far that sometimes he wondered if it were not really weeks, instead of days, since that morning when he walked out of his room and started unwillingly on his mission.

Down here, in the country, the time flew. It was no sooner morning than it was evening; no sooner had the day begun than it was ended. Barry never could find himself wondering what in the world to do with himself, and yet he never did anything at all except wander about the farm and fields.

Sometimes he went out in the rickety little trap with Mr. Daniels; sometimes he tramped along with him over hills and plowed fields; sometimes—as now—Hazel would take him out with her.

Today he had invited himself. It was time the blackberries were picked, he had informed her that morning, looking in for a moment at the kitchen window; it was wicked waste to leave them another moment for the village boys to gather. Was she coming out with him to pick them, or had he got to go alone?

Hazel had looked up from her work. She was making cakes, and her arms were all white with flour, and there was a big pinafore tied round her slim waist.

"I can't come. I'm busy. Can't you see how busy I am?"

Barry leaned his arms on the sill. "I'll come in and help you—I can cook. I used to make ripping toffee when I was at school."

Training of Teachers Important Problem

Lincoln—One of the most difficult and yet one of the most important problems confronting educational administrators today is that of training teachers for the rural school. John M. Matzen, state superintendent of public instruction, and candidate for re-election, declared. From the nature of her work, Mr. Matzen says, it is necessary that a rural teacher be trained not only in subject matter, but in matters of teaching and especially in initiative and responsibility.

"One of the largest agencies attempting to train teachers for the rural schools is the normal training high school," said Mr. Matzen. "The curriculum provided by the normal training high schools consists of three general phases, according to the state superintendent. They are: 1. The regular academic course in the high school. 2. Reviews of the common branches. 3. The principles and practices of teaching."

Midland College Notes

The summer term, one of the most successful in the history of the college, closes July 18.

Dr. Stauffer, whose resignation from the presidency of the college took effect July 1, is still in Lincoln, Kan., called by the pastor of the Lutheran church in that city before his departure. A farewell banquet was held for him and his family in the college dining hall. Among those present were President W. O. Johnson, Dean Charles Amadon, and other members of the faculty.

A fine organ, recently purchased by the college, is being installed in the new chapel building. The installation is to be given by the church choir.

The radio broadcasting station, made possible through the co-operation of one of the business men, is also being set up this summer. The station will be powerful enough to send messages nearly 2,000 miles. The plan is to give concerts put on by Midland talent. It will be possible to hear these concerts in Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Wyoming, North and South Dakota, Iowa and Missouri.

Nebraska School of Business

Miss Bertha Sandstrom, who has just completed her course in the stenographic department of the college, has taken a position in the office of the city of Lincoln, Kan.

Registrations are beginning to come in for the opening of the mid-summer term, which begins with the week of July 17-24. The summer attendance is running considerably heavier than that of a year ago.

Miss Hilda E. Krenston, who is a student in the normal training department, under Miss Gertrude Beers, has been elected commercial instructor in the high school at Alliance. Miss Krenston's home is at Blanton, Neb.

Miss Mayne Swan has accepted a position in the office of the state superintendent of John W. Swan, a former student in the school, now cashier of the state bank at Nelso, Neb.

The demand for office help has been especially acute during the week just closed. Among those taking places are: Ruth L. Smith with the Randall hotel; quarters, Julia Conger and Helen Erickson with the State Department of Public Works; Elizabeth H. Hart with the Bankers' Trust company; and Miss Marie Word has just been received from Miss Martha Weller of the stenographic faculty.

York College Notes

Miss Nina Belle Caldwell, 11, recently completed a three-year course at Northwestern University.

President W. O. Johnson returned Tuesday from a tour of the state in the interests of the college. He will be one of the speakers at the denominational convention of Iowa. From there he will go to Des Moines, to attend an important meeting of the denomination.

The Misses Hazel and Kathryn Rowe, who spent the winter in Porto Rico, the latter teaching there, are attending the University of Columbia this summer. Dean Charles Amadon is attending the

FOR ITCHING TORTURE

Use Antiseptic Liquid Zemo

There is one remedy that seldom fails to stop itching torture and relieve skin irritation, and that makes the skin soft, clear and healthy.

Any drugstore can supply you with Zemo, which generally overcomes skin diseases, Eczema, Itch, Pimples, Rash, Blackheads in most cases give way to Zemo. Frequently, minor blemishes disappear overnight. Itching usually stops instantly. Zemo is a safe, antiseptic liquid, clean, easy to use and dependable. It is sold in a 4-ounce extra large bottle, $1.00. It is positively safe for tender, sensitive skins.

Stabbed by Neuritis!

Many people suffer attacks by this arch-enemy, commonly called "nerve inflammation." The first warning is usually a sharp, stabbing pain, which may "come and go" or hurt constantly. You may feel it in the shoulder, neck, forearm, small of the back, or down the thigh and leg to the heel. It is sometimes mistaken for sciatica, rheumatism or neuritis, which often end in neuritis.

No matter where you have nerve pain or what caused them, you can get relief without using narcotics or poison. Just apply Tyamol over the part that hurts, and in a few minutes the pain will be gone.

Tyamol is absorbed through the pores of the skin. It has a soothing, healing effect upon the diseased nerves, gradually helping to restore them to healthy condition.

Don't suffer any longer. Price 51 at Sherman & McConnell, or any reliable drugstore.
