Irresistible Sets to Make for the Card Table

The habit of having special little lunch sets consisting of a small cloth and four small napkins to use with card tables for refreshments at afternoon and evening parties is growing. Every housewife has several, some have many, sets of linen for these more or less informal refreshments. And it is almost as pleasant to make these sets as it is to use them.

Here are some suggestions for attractive sets: One made of linen, white or oyster gray, is especially attractive. It is made like those little handkerchiefs with pulled threads of color as a border. You pull the linen threads in the same way, and tie in the colored threads and pull them through. Blue threads run in, with a little garland of pink flowers in each corner, look particularly well.

Another sort of set has an edge of machine hemstitching with a border crocheted in the holes of the hemstitching. This border is either in white or in color. The hemstitching is worked on the edge of the material, not at the inside of a hem.

Still another idea is to run a hem with black cotton and to work a design in each corner of one of the symbols of a pack of cards—a club, a diamond, a spade, or a heart. On the little napkins only one corner is worked—so that the four napkins have the four different symbols.

And then there is the cross stitched corner showing a teacup on each of the napkins, and a teapot, a cup and a saucer, a cream jug and a sugar bowl on the four corners of the table cloth. The hem for the set is either crocheted with a picot edge, hemstitching or run with colored or black thread.

They will go on to Sheridan before returning home.

Flora Kalk Leads Armenian Orphans to Safety

How Mrs. Flora Stanton Kalk of Washington, D. C., formerly of Omaha and a sister of Mrs. T. F. Kennedy of Omaha, led 137 Armenian orphans out of the Near East Relief from Uria, Silesia, to more settled regions under French control, is described in a report on the trip which has just been received. Five days were required for the journey.

Mrs. Kalk has been a relief worker in Uria for the past year. She is the mother of the late Lieut. Stanton Kalk, who went down with the destroyer, Jacob Jones, during the war. Mrs. Kalk served overseas in the M. C. A. canteen work. She and Mrs. Kennedy are daughters of the late General Stanton.

"Our caravan consisted of 17 camels, 7 wagons and a half a dozen donkeys," she writes. "These were loaded with tents, blankets, personal baggage and the children, who range from 9 to 15 years. On the outskirts of Uria the Turkish officials checked off each child to see that the total did not exceed the number which we had been permitted to evacuate; then up we went, over the zigzag mountain road. Once hourly we rested, usually beside one of the water holes upon which we depended for our drinking supply."

"Presently we reached Feris Pacha, where lies the ravine in which 300 French troops were massacred after they had marched out of Uria under promise of a safe conduct to Beirut. The French commandant's baggage was carried back to Uria on a spear and was there kicked about the streets. That night we halted at Sarymahara, and had our first unpleasant experience. The camel drivers absolutely refused to put up our tents, preferring to push on. However, the children being tired out, we met the situation by sleeping in the open. Unluckily it rained that night and all the next day, and the treeless mountainside offered no chance of shelter. The children shivered with cold, and that with two feet of mud on the road, we could not even enjoy the luxury of sitting down. Fortunately we found a large, empty cistern and crawled into it for a rest. The provision wagon had overturned, dumping everything in the mud. All we had to eat for the midday meal was half a loaf of bread apiece.

"Off we started again, with the wind wrapping our soaked garments about our bodies, and our legs knee-deep in mud. Soon the children became absolutely exhausted, many of them falling face downward in the mud and refusing to move. By heroic efforts we reached the village of Eski Serudj where we found a khan, or native mud-inn. We gave the children a hot supper and dosed them with quinine, then we fell asleep in the khan courtyard, surrounded by camels, donkeys, calves, chickens and natives. During the night I was successively aroused by a camel, three donkeys, a calf and various dogs, which were nosing about for food. I slept in my clothes, and in fact, none of my party took their clothes off from Sunday until Thursday night. Eski Serudj proved to be one of the so-called "beehive" mud villages, which are so picturesque from a distance, and so unsavory when seen from within.

"Next day we procured wagons and made up two parties, the one consisting of 70 children who would go with me, the other comprising 67 children who were so tired out that it was deemed best to send them along later. We left at 3 a. m., after a vast amount of yelling and cursing on the drivers' parts, and much groaning and scolding on the part of the unwilling camels. By daybreak we were passing many mud villages and Arab camps, with their black tents of goats' hair, while behind us rose the majestic Taurus mountains with snow-capped peaks. Once, passing through a village, we found ourselves surrounded by savage-faced Kurds who commenced snatching food and extra clothing from the children. Fortunately we had several guards and so managed to escape with unharmed loads. The guards seemed to regret the fact that they could not stir up a genuine fight, as they had 100 rounds of ammunition with them.

"On reaching the half-destroyed bridge which spans the Euphrates between Kemalist and French territory, we got a native to clamber out on the girders and shout across a message to the effect that some Americans in charge of a party of Near East Relief orphans wanted ferryage to the opposite bank. Up dashed a French motorboat with an officer who presented the commandant's compliments, and an invitation to spend the night at headquarters. However, we spent the night where we were, sleeping in some abandoned boxcars. As a matter of fact, due to prowling animals and the presence of thievish Kurds, I lay awake all night long, following my head on my suitcase.

"Early next morning we moved baggage and children to the river bank and crossed in the five large rowboats with which the French provided us. Arriving on the other bank, I and the Turkish officials checked and rechecked the children, who were then put into boxcars on the train for Aleppo. When we reached our destination at 8 o'clock that night, we were so weary that we could have gone to sleep standing up. Meanwhile the second party of children at Eski Serudj had come along under charge of another Near East Relief worker. We had not lost a child, and with the exception of a few blisters and backaches, nobody was the worse for our arduous trip."
