Fashion Notes. A lovely negligee of georgette crepe has a scarf collar of wide satin ribbon, folded into soft pleats at the back, clinging to the neck, and hanging in long ends at the front.

A hat and a sleeveless jacket made of soft duvety or of silk, to match, both showing the same sort of embroidery, quilting or other trimming, form an effective set for sport wear.

Problems That Perplex Answered by BEATRICE FAIRFAX

Ideals in a Weakening. Dear Miss Fairfax: I am deeply in love with a man, four years my senior. He tells me often about another girl to whom he says he was engaged. Lately he claims that whenever he takes her out and shows a little affection to her she returns it a hundredfold.

He tells me this and yet he doesn't seem to understand that I love him. Although I have never told him in words, I think my actions have often showed it. Should I force myself to love the other girl, or should I keep on loving him and perhaps some day he will know? He says he has no love left for the other girl, but yet he takes her out and sends her flowers.

I am afraid the man you are idealizing is a weakening. His attitude toward the other girl is in no way manly or admirable. And he evidently feels so much interested in himself that he isn't considering you at all. You don't love the man you describe—you couldn't. You merely drape him in the qualities you would like him to have and give your heart to your own creation. See him as a shilly-shallying and selfish youth, and realize that such an individual can't bring happiness or devotion into any woman's life.

I Am No Movie Bureau. Blue Eyes and Brown Eyes: I take my stand here and now and announce to all my readers that I am not a bureau of information on the movies. In this case I turned your letter over to the movie editor, and he has the goodness of his heart he looked up the addresses you want, but I will not guarantee to do it for any one else.

Doing the Manly Thing. Dear Miss Fairfax: I am 29 and in love with a girl of 24. I was seeing her home one night, and, owing to the fact that I had been laid off the week before, I told her I did not know where to go.

I have written to her several times asking her forgiveness, but don't get any answer. Could you advise me as to what to do?

Put your pride in your pocket and go straight to the girl's home. Writing letters is an easy way of saving yourself from embarrassment or humiliation. But to have a talk with the girl or her father is the manly thing to do.

My Marriage Problems

Adele Garrison's New Phase of "REVELATIONS OF A WIFE"

(Copyright 1922)

What Madge's Father Asked for Harry Underwood. Lillian is the least curious of women, but as I backed Dickey's car out of the garage and drove it to the road in front of our house...

The scene near the car was very different from the one I had left a few minutes before. My father's efficient handiwork was evidenced by the neat bandages which adorned the chauffeur's head, and also the cordial relief which the handkerchief embroidered by Grace Draper presented.

My father, as I had expected, was seated in the big car with Harry Underwood. I had known that the two men would be together, and I knew also that the interview had a poignant personal interest for both of them entirely apart from the secret, melodramatic message which one had sent the other.

Two Tried Comrades. They had been tried comrades in a South American wilderness through a most stressful and painful experience, and I knew my father considered that upon one occasion at least he owned life and reason to the younger man's courage and resourcefulness.

Through all the obloquy which had attached to Harry Underwood's name in the awful time following the attempt to murder Dicky by sawing the wing of his airplane, my father had insisted that a drunken and perhaps drug-crazed spree was the sole reason for the man's complicity in Grace Draper's dastardly scheme.

He bolstered his theory by the undeniable fact that at the last minute when Harry Underwood had come to himself he had rushed to struck some great lout. And I thought he fell heavily. "You hit me—that's what you did," Mr. Bear growled. He was angry, both because Mrs. Bear had hurt him and because she had called him a "great lout."

But in a little while he felt well enough to sit up and eat a hearty meal. And then Mrs. Bear stopped worrying about him.

During supper Cuffy was unusually quiet for him. He was thinking deeply, but at last he spoke what was on his mind.

"Are they called bats because we have to bat them?" he asked his father.

Indian Boy Gives Up Tribal Ways to Win Lasting Name

Red Man, Adopted Brother of Nebraska Editor, Has Brilliant Career as Teacher and Preacher.

Lincoln, July 24.—(By A. P.)—The history of an Indian boy who renounced his tribal manners and customs in 1851 to associate with white residents that he might rise high in the esteem of country and gain for him a lasting name, was told today by The Associated Press by Cecil Matthews, editor of the Blue Hill (Neb.) Leader.

The remarkable story of the rise of this Digger Indian boy of California interlocks the equally remarkable story of Osee Matthews' caravan of 100 covered wagons from Iowa and Nebraska to California in the years following the discovery of gold in California in 1849.

When Osee Matthews reached California in 1850 or 1851, he obtained the aid of Digger Indians in the erection and construction of the first mill in California.

A small Digger Indian, taking a fancy to the Matthews family, made a point of loitering around the cabin of the family where he could observe the traits of his new-found friends.

Here he obtained kindly treatment from the whites in return for which he volunteered his services in carrying wood and water to the cabin.

A little later he made application through the chief of the Digger tribe to make his home with the Matthews family. Consent was obtained to this arrangement and the boy was scrubbed, dressed and furnished with white boys' clothing and a bed—the conversion of an overturned wagon box. He was christened Peter Owaha Matthews.

When the family decided to go back to "the states" to better educate the Matthews children, Peter, of the ambitious designs pressed his claim for an education equally as good as that of the whites.

Showing on the part of Osee Matthews, who had a difference of opinion as to the value of an education to an Indian.

At length the Indian chief of the Digger tribe and the elder Matthews, after a long struggle, agreed to satisfy the whim of Peter Owaha Matthews. He was given $400 to pay his passage, via Panama, to New York.

Here, with the Matthews family, the boy, Peter, journeyed to Ohio, where with two sons and a daughter of Osee Matthews, he entered the Hiram College at Hiram, Ohio. They were instructed by James A. Garfield, afterward president of the United States. Later, Peter went to the south, entering a southern college, where he was educated for the ministry.

When the civil war broke out the Indian joined up with the Matthews boys on the northern side, serving in an Iowa regiment for four years.

Appointed by Garfield. Following the war, Peter was next heard from as a government scout among the Indians of the northwest.

When Garfield became president, he was appointed a teacher and a preacher among the Winnebagoes.

Marriage to a French-Canadian woman of educational ability soon followed, by whom he had a son and a daughter. His wife died soon after the birth of his first child.

Records disclose that Peter affiliated with a religious book concern as a lecturer. He toured the east, where his speeches attracted widespread attention. He delivered 40 lectures in Chicago in the winter of 1888.

In 1890 Peter Matthews came to Kansas to visit his foster parents. He remained west two years, doing regular work in Iowa, Kansas and Nebraska and at the same time sent his children to Lincoln, Neb., to be educated at Wesleyan college.

The daughter died a few years later. At present the whereabouts of Peter Owaha Matthews are unknown. Cecil Matthews, editor, his relative by adoption, has not heard from him in many years. It is possible that he is in California.
