Elopement Will Not Put Romance on Safe Basis.

By BEATRICE FAIRFAX. "I am 20," writes Gerald, "and I am deeply in love with a girl I've known since I was 15 and she was 11. Don't laugh, for this is serious business to the two of us. We prude cares for me, too, and we would elope, only I haven't any money—haven't finished college. My folks won't hear it—and Prue's family feels the same way. They say we are children and must wait. They say if we feel the same way when she is 18 and I am 22, they will let us be engaged and then in a year or two, when I have made good at the business in which they'll start me—we can marry. Shall we elope now—for we love each other too much to wait?"

Stop a minute, Gerald, and ask yourself a square, uncompromising question: "Do you and Prue love each other too much to wait—or don't you love each other enough to wait?"

If your love is nothing but a mad passion—a wild infatuation, it won't last through the conditions your reckless marriage will bring upon you. If you marry now you are going to meet trials and tribulations, tests and difficulties you are not considering.

Won't you blame Prue if later you feel handicapped by the lack of the college education on which you are now bent? If she has to give up the comforts of her home to share your uncertain fortunes, isn't she likely to feel that you have cost her a great deal?

When 16 and 20 are whirled into marriage, it is because ruthless old nature is on their track. She wants her world peopled, and so makes blind instinct whisk youth into the mating from which she hopes to profit in terms of a few young lives. If 16 and 20 can go off and make a nest, and children come into that little home, then nature's plan works out and there is a fair chance that all will go well. But generally when young things mate there isn't enough "straw" for them to build their own nests, so lacking the money for their own home they come into the house of their elders. Then their attempts to adjust themselves to the marriage partnership are fraught with difficulties. Not only do the boy and girl have to learn to suit each other, but they must also adjust themselves to living in a new home, sharing it with the older generation, being at once man and wife and still the "children" of parents who don't find it easy to consider Clyde and Prue grownups.

A home is a vital part of marriage. The partnership idea so integral a part of true marriage—has to come through home building, through children, through dreams which are worked out by two alone and unhandicapped by financial dependence on others.

Wait, Gerald. Wait—all you 20-year-old boys. If time proves your choice, the years will stretch ahead in wonderful procession.
