Not Neglect, But Real Devotion.

By BEATRICE FAIRFAX.

THE man I expect to marry some day is making me very unhappy, writes C. J. W. It isn't that he came right out and asked me to be engaged. It's just that he doesn't go around with other girls and acts as if he loved me and is always talking of our future. So I think I have a right to plan my life with him in it. But he neglects me so that I can't be happy. He works three nights a week. He goes to lodge one night.

"One evening he spends with a crowd of men friends. And he always goes home for Sunday with his mother in the country. And that leaves two evenings out and Wednesday and Saturday. If I have something important on for one of those evenings, he tries to be nice about it. But I know he is hurt. Only it never occurs to him to substitute one of his busy evenings for it. So sometimes I see him only once a week. We've talked things over to no avail. He seems to think his lodge and his boy friends all important. But nothing I want to do counts.

He says that if I cared to see him he'd come on Saturday. I'd keep the evenings open—and if I don't he isn't to blame. A little coldness is growing between us. And yet I feel I can't live without him. I can't give in. But I want to find a way to make him treat me right."

Here's another letter which tells practically the same story. Rosa writes:

"I'm secretly engaged to a man of whom I think the world. But I'm not happy because I don't think he's treating me right. He has time for everything, but me. He always has excuses about seeing his partner on business or having to go out of town on business or having to take customers to dinner. And often these things come up at the last minute and I find myself sitting at home night after night crying my eyes out."

Now while I sympathize most earnestly with the girl who finds that having a man's love doesn't assure you of his attention and devotion at the time it is needed, will either C. J. W. or Rosa or any of the numerous other girls who write me to the same effect are doing much to improve their situations.

As long as there are such things in the world as business and ambition and the need of making a living, men are going to be off about their affairs on numerous occasions when their women folks would like them to be dancing attendance.

Love and marriage are the serious business of life. A man needs a bright future before he takes out himself a wife. A man doesn't give up all desire to get ahead in the world the minute he finds the girl he wants to get ahead for. And if he did who would suffer because of his "shiftlessness" than his wife?

The woman whose love is big and constructive must teach herself to share a man's ambitions. She must urge him on to achievement. She mustn't put the moment ahead of the great future of days and years. She mustn't be so intent on her own good times and the companionship she craves at a given moment that she loses sight of the goal toward which a man may be working all the time he spends away from her.

If a man is so absorbed in his own viewpoint, however, that he doesn't see his sweetheart as an individual with longings and hopes and desires of her own—then he is selfish—but, perhaps, nothing worse. And even a selfish man can be educated by a girl who has tact and love and patience and understanding.

Generally when a man devotes his time to one woman, it is because he thinks her The One Woman. And if he doesn't come up to her standards of devotion, but is honest and fearless and hard working, she mustn't lay more stress on sentimentality and attention than on the big sentiment which impels her man to work hard to give her the kind of future he wants her to share.

My Marriage Problems

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of "REVELATIONS OF A WIFE"

(Copyright 1922)

The Work Lillian Laid Out for Tom Chester to Do. Allen Drake was the first to speak over Tom Chester's dramatic outburst.

"If the young man will kindly explain whose life he means," he drawled provocatively, but Lillian interposed swiftly: "Keep out, Allen!" She turned to young Mr. Chester with a reassuring air.

"I won't deny that there is a certain risk to all of us," she said gravely, "but I am very sure it can be reduced to a minimum. And there is no reason why Mrs. Graham—"

she caught my indignant eye, and cut short her sentence. "There is every reason why Mrs. Graham should share any unpleasantness," I said icily. "Please remember, Lillian, that wherever you are in this affair, I shall be with you."

She flashed me a glance of approval and apology, although I well knew that as far as her plan of campaign was concerned, my defiant words were worthless. I would be stationed exactly where she chose. But at least I had declared my own attitude, and again I felt my father's hand pressing my shoulder, and knew that even through his fear for me he approved my stand.

Lillian Looks Ahead. "But we are wasting time," Lillian declared. "Mr. Chester, how good an actor are you?"

"A very poor one," the young man answered with sincerity in his tones. "With such modesty, you're extremely likely to be a good one," Lillian retorted. "But, honestly now, don't you think you could stage a convincing road bandit holdup for the benefit of Mr. Smith tomorrow night?"

"I could do anything to clip that fellow's claws," he replied earnestly. "And that's exactly what I want you to do. First of all I am going to ask you to interview Mr. Briggs, Smith's employer, early tomorrow morning, and see that our precious friend's every movement is watched. Then, when he starts over here tomorrow night, we'll surround the stage a holdup along the road, take any money he has to make it realistic, but be sure to frisk him for revolvers."

"If he's the man I think he is—and that's a little thing I'm going to find out—please Allen, when he gets here—be a walking arsenal. You won't get 'em all, for he probably has some mighty ingenious weapons hidden in those rags of his, but you'll be able to get nearly everything he has. Then tie him loosely, so he can surely wriggle free, and deposit him in the garage by the side of the road, then beat it down here—of course, leaving one man near him to watch his proceedings."

"I'll tell you now—and then we won't have to keep you any longer—tomorrow night, when he gets here, don't you think you could stage a convincing road bandit holdup for the benefit of Mr. Smith tomorrow night?"
