

Russia to Sell Grain on Market

To Export Surplus Crops From South and Buy in London and Liverpool for Northern Sections.

Benefit to U. S. Farmer

By GRAFFTON S. WILSOX.

Washington, Aug. 19.—Decision of the Russian soviet government recently announced to export at least a part of the grain crop now maturing in Russia will work to the benefit of American grain growers rather than injure them, in the opinion of government experts.

Indignation voiced in many quarters in this country at the announced intention of the Moscow authorities to export grain when the country is just recovering from the most terrible famine in its history is unwarranted, officials here assert.

Far from operating to the detriment of the Russian people, this course of action, experts here believe, is dictated by stern necessity. The misunderstanding on this subject arose, they point out, from the fact that the soviet delegates at The Hague, either intentionally or unintentionally, gave the impression that grain was to be exported from Russia this year because there was a surplus above the needs of the Russian population.

Since it was well known here that no such surplus could possibly exist, some Americans jumped to the conclusion that Lenin and Trotsky intended to disregard the needs of the peasant population and trust to the charity of the American relief administration and other organizations to bring the winter population through another year of starvation.

No Surplus Grain. Inquiry developed that this assumption was entirely unwarranted. Officials here say: The truth of the matter is that no surplus of grain exists in Russia today nor will it exist after the present harvest is passed.

In the southern part of Russia there apparently is a good crop of grain, especially in the Ukraine and the Caucasus, once known as the "granary of Europe."

Cowboys in Battle at Fontenelle

Cousin of "Buffalo Bill" Was Wounded Twice in Early Morning Street Brawl.

Five Shots Are Fired

A wild-west shooting in real life in front of Hotel Fontenelle early Saturday morning resulted in the wounding of Thomas Norton, wealthy rancher of Buffalo, Wyo., a cousin of Buffalo Bill.

Five shots were fired by the participants, but so far as is known the two that struck Mr. Norton were the only effective ones.

The shooting was staged after what police admit was a "liquor party." The party is said to have broken up about 1 Saturday morning in a quarrel, with the prospective combatants deciding to "leave the hotel and 'shoot it out' on the street."

Police were summoned and the wounded cousin of Buffalo Bill was taken to St. Joseph hospital, where, when complete consciousness returned, he told attendants that he'd be glad to have the matter "hushed up." He left the hospital about noon saying he would return later for final treatment.

A public report of the shooting was not made by police and the only information available was at the hospital.
