

U.S. Relief Work to End Part in Near East Row

America to Remain Aloof Unless Struggle Over Turkish Problem Threatens World Peace.

By GEORGE F. AUTHIER.
Washington, Sept. 23.—(Special.) While the United States is participating in the rescue work at Smyrna, burned after its occupation by the Turks, this country will end its participation in near eastern affairs with this move. Not unless the struggle now impending over the settlement of the Turkish problem should threaten the peace of the world could this government be induced to participate.

In the near east section is seen an evidence of those peculiarly European and Asiatic problems which justify the wisdom of the United States in having refrained from entry into the league of nations and in insisting upon remaining aloof from European politics.

The United States had no part in the treaty of Sevres, resulting in the distribution of territory which has caused the present crisis in Turkey. Along the Dardanelles, as ever is found the crass selfishness of European politics, which has permitted the Turk to exist long after his natural time, because the powers could not agree among themselves who should seize the rich prize the Turk was to be forced to forego. Its value long has been recognized. When Napoleon considered the advisability of courting the friendship of the Russian czar with the price of giving over to the czar the command of the straits, he indicated Constantinople on the map, saying: "Who controls here will rule the world."

Peace of Shreds.
When the world war closed the allied powers were still unable to decide who should rule at Constantinople, nor were they ready to evict the Turk wholly from his ancient heritage. A compromise was reached in a peace of shreds and patches, which could prove only a truce. Turkish control was to be eliminated from Constantinople and the Dardanelles neutralized, but the rest of the Turkish empire was thrown as a bone to a pack of hungry dogs.

The situation that has resulted in the uprising of the Turkish nationalists under Mustafa Kemal began in the spring of 1919, when the peace treaty was being concluded. Venizelos, the greatest of the Greeks, saw Italy angling for a place in Smyrna, in order to make up for its loss of Fiume and suggested the Greeks be put in control. Both the French and the English, especially the latter, agreed to this and Lloyd George then undertook to make the Greek "the soldier of the east. England compromised by permitting Constantine to regain his throne and then commenced a series of bickerings and wranglings which has been without end. The treaty of Sevres, which undertook to parcel out the territory in this region, and negotiated in the following year, aroused the ire of the Turks to such an extent they went to war at once, and that agreement has never been ratified.

This treaty did not give Smyrna outright to the Greeks, but proposed they should remain in charge for a period of five years, after which there was to have been a plebiscite, when it would be determined whether the territory should belong to Greece or to the Turk. Tiring of Turkish opposition, Greece in 1921 undertook to take possession by force and the result is she has just been hurled out of Asia Minor.

After the first attempt to force the Turk out of Smyrna, the Greeks suddenly decided they would take over Constantinople themselves. It is asserted this gesture towards Constantinople was made with the consent, tacit or actual, of Premier Lloyd George. The Greeks withdrew 50,000 troops from the Angora front and placed the gesture, meanwhile placing responsibility upon the allies for all the disorder and atrocities which had occurred in Asia Minor. The movement towards Constantinople, whether there ever was an intent to carry it out, was halted by notice from the allies that it would not be permitted. At the same time, the nationalist Turk forces opened up a great offensive against the Greeks all along the Angora front and the Greeks began a retreat.

Alignment Completed.
The alignment of the allies in the Graeco-Turkish conflict is complicated. France and Italy have consistently supported Turkey while Great Britain has sided with Greece. France has carried her support even to the extent of negotiating a treaty with the Turkish government at Angora.

As Mediterranean powers, France and Italy have looked askance upon the growth of the power of Greece, and have preferred to see Turkey retain some of her power rather than to encourage the rivalry of the Greek government. Another consideration which has entered into the determination of the French attitude was which France was given a mandate. The French naturally wished to be on good terms with their Mohammedan neighbor, Turkey, and an ostensible friendship for Turkey improved relations, also, between the French and the native Mohammedans in Morocco and Algeria. At the same time, French financial interests are understood to have been granted valuable concessions in Turkey at the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Angora.

The change from the Venizelist government to the monarchy under King Constantine was very disastrous to the French. Constantine, married to a sister of the Kaiser, was regarded by the French with almost as much ill will as they regard the Kaiser.

Great Britain, on the other hand, always has shown an attitude of antagonism towards Turkey, public sentiment throughout the British dominions having been greatly influenced by stories of atrocities by the Turks against Christian minorities.

Upon the outcome of the present conflict in Asia Minor may rest the solution of the problem of recognition by the United States of the Greek government.
