SLEEPY-TIME TALES FATTY COON MORE OF HIS ADVENTURES

CHAPTER XVII. Fatty Coon's Favorite Story.

When Fatty Coon was very young he used to like to hear bedtime stories. Early morning—and not evening—was the time when Mrs. Coon read bedtime stories to her son.

Once—and only once—Mrs. Coon tried to read animal stories to Fatty. But he didn't care for them in the least. He said they were silly—every one of them.

"Well, all up and down Pleasant Valley it was the fashion to read animal stories to children. Everybody was doing it. And with a sigh Mrs. Coon laid aside the volume of 'Twisted Tails for Tiny Tots' and said to her only son, 'Then from what book do you want me to read to you?'

"The cook book!" Fatty Coon answered promptly. "Even at this early age, next to eating good food Fatty loved to hear about it."

"Bless me!" Mrs. Coon exclaimed. "I never owned a cook book. I suppose I shall have to get one."

When she spoke to Mr. Coon about the matter he said gruffly that the family didn't need any such thing. But Mrs. Coon had her way. The very next morning, at Fatty's bedtime, she opened her new cookbook and read a story that pleased him mightily. This was the way it began:

TO ROAST A CHICKEN. One very fat, tender chicken. Bread crumbs, one pint. One small teaspoonful of summer savory.

A piece of butter the size of a walnut. Salt and pepper to suit the taste. Fatty Coon listened breathlessly to this.

"That's the best story I ever heard! Read me another, Ma!"

Every word. Not until his mother had finished the story did he say a word. "That's the best story I ever heard! Read me another, Ma!"

Mrs. Coon said no. She told him to get up and go to bed. "Strange to say, after that Fatty Coon was always eager for bedtime to come. Day by day Mrs. Coon read to him stories of how to cook meats and vegetables and breadstuffs, cakes, puddings and pies; how to prepare sauces and salads; how to make pickles and preserves. But of all these delightful tales, Fatty's favorite was the first one that he had heard. Again and again he asked his mother to read to him that wonderful, wonderful, 'To Roast a Chicken.' And after he had heard it about 57 times, being quick to learn he knew it by heart.

Often he teased his mother to roast a chicken for him. But Mrs. Coon said that she was too busy to bother with newfangled dishes. So Fatty made up his mind that as soon as he was old enough to get a chicken for himself he would prepare it as the cookbook said.

And he did—or as nearly in the same way as he could. When he was a year old he went down to Farmer Green's henhouse and got him a fat pullet. Not having any bread crumbs he took some sawdust from the iced house; for, so very young, he picked some checkerberry leaves in the woods; in place of butter he borrowed a dab of axle grease from Farmer Green; he used white sand for salt and dark sand for pepper. All these things Fatty Coon mixed together; and with the whole he stuffed his chicken. And then, being very hungry, he did not wait to cook the chicken, but ate it just as it was.

Somewhat the chicken did not taste as good as he had expected. In a little while he began to feel quite unquiescent because of darting pains that stabbed him right under the third button of his waistcoat.

My Marriage Problems

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife."

The Way Mother Graham "Let Go" With Katie and Junior.

I was not long left in doubt as to my mother-in-law's reaction to Junior's baby temper. From the other side of my closed door I heard the wrathful snuff which presages explosive tears with her, and then a snarling command: "Katie, get to your work this instant."

"There was so much concentrated anger in her voice that I fancy even Katie was intimidated. At any rate, the sullen note in her voice was replaced by a timorous one: 'I don't know where you want me to begin.'"

"Begin! Begin!" Mother Graham's voice rose in a crescendo. "Begin with the cobwebs. Fasten a clean flannel cloth around your broom, and get them down from every ceiling and wall. Then come to me in Mr. Graham's room. I'm going to give it a thorough cleaning. It hasn't been touched since he went away."

"Misses Graham say Meester Graham no like his room feezed oop." From the sound of Katie's voice I knew that she had turned back from the door to defend me, though she had suffered to pass in silence the renewed challenge of the cobwebs.

"I am not interested in Mrs. Graham's opinions," my mother-in-law said loftily. "But I certainly shall take the privilege of attending to my son's room."

"I knew only too well the sentence she left unspoken because her innate good breeding would not permit her to criticize me openly before a servant. 'Poor Richard!'

"This was his burden, I knew, for she had elaborated upon the motif silently and orally ever since I had married her son. I wonder sometimes if all mothers-in-law sing the same strain. Then I lay bare my own love for Junior with a conscience scolded, and fear that when I am as old as she I shall be every bit as captious toward the woman whom my boy chooses.

"This presence of the future, however, did not prevent me from hotly resenting her slighting reference to me. I stuffed my handkerchief into my mouth to smother the laugh which otherwise would have been audible through my closed door. But his grandmother was in anything but a laughing mood.

"Oh! Grandma!" "Richard Second!" she said in an awful voice. "Don't you ever dare to speak that way to me again!"

Temper begets temper, among the Grahams, at least, and Junior promptly proved my handkerchief into my mouth to smother the laugh which otherwise would have been audible through my closed door. But his grandmother was in anything but a laughing mood.

I guessed only too well what had happened. Unmoved and angered, my mother-in-law had reverted for an instant to the sterner discipline of methods of her own young motherhood.

Mrs. Lord Gives Tea for Mrs. Randall

Mrs. L. M. Lord will be hostess at tea at her home Friday afternoon from 2:30 to 4:30 in honor of Mrs. Charles H. Randall, wife of the republican candidate for governor.

Assisting Mrs. Lord will be Mesdames Grant Williams, Benjamin Baker, Draper Smith, P. C. Hyson, D. T. Moran and A. L. Shamp. Without further invitation, all ward and precinct committeewomen in the city are invited.

Ordinary Fabric Stains. Most stains can be removed from fabrics by stretching the material taut across the top of a sauceman, with the stain in the center. Then from a height of two or three feet slowly pour boiling hot water on the stain. In most cases the marks will immediately disappear.

Don't Forget. The neighbor who has not access to your home is very apt to judge what sort of a housekeeper you are by the outside appearance. Wash your windows, polish your brasswork, keep your yard clean and your porch tidy. It will not only be a credit to you, but to the entire neighborhood.

When hanging out clothes in cold weather, rub a little corn starch on your hands before you go out. This will prevent them from chapping. A small towel rack makes an excellent necktie holder if fastened alongside the dresser or inside the closet door.

Shoes of Comfort for All Occasions. Evening Slippers of Satin Strapped or Tongued---Brocaded or Plain. No matter what may be the occasion—the fashionably dressed woman knows the prime importance of "correctness" in her footwear.

The lines of the season's smartest costumes for evening, dance or dinner wear find perfect harmony in the graceful straps or tongues; of brocade, satin or charming combinations of both, and in the new French or Spanish heels of Fry's exquisite newly arrived slippers for fall and winter.

And at Fry's one buys not only for style, but also for economy, for prices here are surprisingly moderate. "Satisfying Shoes at Money-Saving Prices"
