Mrs. Henry Wyman Sees Mrs. Felton Seated in Senate; Also Yale-Princeton Game

Word has come that Mrs. Henry Wyman, who is stopping at the Grafton hotel in Washington, D. C., was among the spectators Wednesday, November 22, when Mrs. Felton, from Georgia, took her seat as the first woman senator.

Mrs. Wyman writes that she was with her son, James, at the Princeton-Yale game, in Princeton, and that her daughter, Margaret, who is a student this year at Johns Hopkins, came down to be with the party.

Mrs. Wyman was in the Quadrangle club box at the Senior Prom Friday night and even the wives and sisters joined the long snake dance that trailed around the campus.

EEPY-TIME TALES TOMMY FOX ADVENTURER

CHAPTER III. Tommy Fox Dies a Hole for Uncle Jerry Chuck.

It was fall and Uncle Jerry Chuck wanted a new home for the coming winter. His old one was not warm enough to suit him.

Uncle Jerry Chuck had all the tools that he needed for digging himself another—and better—house in the pasture. He had some good, sharp claws and some good, strong paws.

Uncle Jerry never liked to use these tools. To tell the truth, he was lazy. He intended to have a new home. But he meant to get somebody else to do the work.

This was why he hung a sign outside his door—a sign which said: A Strong Person Wanted for Deep Digging.

Then he crept up and looked closely at the tip of Tommy's tail.

Uncle Chuck then sat down outside his doorway to wait for callers.

The first one to see his sign and ask for work was Master Meadow Mouse. But Uncle Jerry Chuck laughed at him.

"Go home and grow!" Uncle Jerry told him. "You're too little for that work."

Then Sandy Chipmunk stopped and told Uncle Jerry he was all ready to begin.

"Do you want what?" Uncle Jerry asked him with a sneer.

"Digging!" said Sandy Chipmunk. "Very well!" Uncle Jerry Chuck replied. "But kindly don't dig around here. I don't want a lot of little scratches all over my door yard."

Somewhat the news spread fast through the fields—the news that Uncle Jerry Chuck wanted a digger, and that he was hard to suit. A good many of the field and forest-folk came to call on Uncle Jerry. But not one of them he would hire. He told them all that he wanted a strong digger or none at all.

At last a stranger came trotting up to Uncle Jerry's house. He was heavily wrapped in winter clothing, being so bundled up that Uncle Jerry couldn't see much of him except his eyes and his feet.

It was a big fellow. Uncle Jerry stared at his paws and claws. They were certainly the kind for deep digging.

"Do you want work?" Uncle Jerry asked him.

"Yes!" replied the stranger.

"Then you've come to the right place. You may begin to dig me a house over there under that pile of stones."

Uncle Jerry Chuck said nothing at all about that. The stranger did not seem to notice that. And Uncle Jerry Chuck chuckled to himself as the dirt began to fly.

"This fellow is a simpleton," he thought.

Now, Uncle Jerry Chuck was the simpleton. Little did he dream that the person who was digging his house was Tommy Fox himself.

He had said nothing about pay because he meant to take his pay when he was ready for it, and in the way that suited him best.

While he worked, Uncle Jerry hovered about and gave orders almost constantly. Some people wouldn't like to work for anybody as fussy as Uncle Jerry Chuck was. But this worker didn't seem to mind. No matter what fault Uncle Jerry found with his digging, he smiled and said nothing—and never stopped digging.

"This fellow is a good worker," Uncle Jerry thought. "I wish I had found him before. I like silent workers. They always work fast." And then he began to find some other fault with the way the stranger was digging his house. That was Uncle Jerry's way. He was never known to praise anybody but himself.

At last the stranger stopped working and backed out of the hole that he had made. And now he spoke.

"Just step inside, Mr. Chuck," he invited Uncle Jerry. "I want this house to suit you. Take a good look at it."

Uncle Jerry Chuck was just about to jump down into the hole, when he happened to see the stranger's tongue. It was a long, red tongue. And it hung out of the fellow's mouth in such a way that it made a shiver creep up and down Uncle Jerry's back. It was a warm day, too, although it was fall.

"Keep digging!" Uncle Jerry ordered, changing his mind suddenly—about entering the hole. "Go deeper."

"The stranger gave him a sly look. But Uncle Jerry pulled a bit of clover and ate it as if he hadn't a care in the world.

"He doesn't know me," thought Tommy Fox. "He's a simpleton." And he set to work once more.

But now it was Tommy Fox who was the simpleton. For Uncle Jerry
