Shopping Economy

By MRS. HARLAND H. ALLEN Rubber Ware for the Kitchen.

There are not a great many rubber articles sold in the housefurnishings department, but such as are used are quite indispensable, and will do much toward completing the equipment of your home and thus lessening the little inconveniences and annoyances of housekeeping.

Of course there are the rubber rings for sealing and closing fruit jars when preserving or canning, and experience has already taught you that the best is none too good to buy. Unless you get the best, there is bound to be consequent loss in breakage and spoilage of expensive materials, as well as your own time and labor wasted.

Not every housewife knows that she can buy rubber mats to put in the sink and thus save many dollars by preventing the breakage of her china. These mats are also a protection to the sink. Rubber sink brushes, and little flat rubber plate scrapers, for scraping food particles from the dishes before washing, are worth all they cost.

Some women always use perforated rubber mats on linoleum or tiled kitchen floors. They are easier on the feet, and will wear for a long time. They are useful also for kitchen hallways and stairs.

It is a good plan to invest a few cents in a box of assorted rubber corks while you are about it. Such a foresight will save the time so often lost in futile hunting for the right cork to fit the right bottle.

Large flat corks like those for big jugs will prove to be great labor savers when you come to the task of cleaning kitchen knives. And they not only save labor, but prevent the staining of a perfectly good dishcloth.

Rubber is sold for door mats to protect the woodwork and to eliminate noise. Little rubber "feet" to slip over the tip ends of table and chair legs save the floor finish as well as the family's nerves.

And no careful, modern housewife forgets the rubber gloves to preserve her hands when washing dishes, or doing other rough kitchen work.

This about the full list of rubber things for the kitchen, though, perhaps the persistent shopper will be rewarded by discovering others. Remember that having purchased a supply of rubber articles, a certain amount of reasonable care is necessary. Rubber goods deteriorate very rapidly unless kept in a cool, dark place. Oil dissolves rubber, and so household must never be used to clean it. Where two layers of rubber are likely to stick together, the adjacent surfaces should be dried carefully, and dusted over with talcum powder.

Flounce of Invention Worth Pound of Straight

By CORINNE LOWE.

New York, (Special Correspondence).—Full knee deep lies the winter flounce. Even when its altitude is not fixed, this detail is pretty apt to lie. For it is a feature of the season's styles which every designer has caught up with enthusiasm and which each has interpreted in his own way. Sometimes the flounce is circular and sometimes, as illustrated here, is it otherwise.

The model shown above, one of those felicitous mixtures of dinner, afternoon and restaurant frocks, is a stunning combination of two kinds of crepes. The main section is a brown brocade material while both flounce and drapery over the shoulders are of plain brown crepe. Two round steel ornaments are placed at either side of the waist line.

The originality of the shoulder drapery, coming straight across the front, folding over the top and descending into two sharp points in the back, makes this an exceedingly effective model. It will be noticed that the V of the flounce balances the corners of the drapery.

Problems That Perplex

Emotions and Love. Dear Miss Fairfax: Can love exist when a person feels no great emotion? I am going out with a young man of 29, one year my senior (having known him for two years previously) and in that time he has come to love me dearly. He is an honest-to-goodness fellow, one whom you can depend upon. I care for him dearly and also tell him I love him, but now some friends have cast a doubt in my mind, saying I cannot love him if I do not get a thrill when he touches me. It would break his heart to give him up and I would feel very lonely. ANXIOUS. Don't let other folks get you into a critical and agitated frame of mind

SLEEPY-TIME TALES JIMMY RABBIT ONCE MORE BY ARTHUR SCOTT BAILEY

CHAPTER XI. Jimmy Rabbit Sings for Somebody. Jimmy Rabbit was glad he had taken his first singing lesson of old Mr. Crow. Mr. Crow had taught him a mournful ditty, which he had assured Jimmy was just the thing to sing under somebody's window, for a serenade. It was somewhat late in the afternoon when Jimmy learned the song. He knew that he couldn't serenade Miss Belinda Bunny then, because the whole Bunny family would be waking up from their daytime naps and thinking about stealing down to Farmer Green's garden as soon as it began to grow dark, to hunt for their supper. "I'll wait until tomorrow morning," Jimmy decided. "After they've come home and gone to bed I'll go to their house and sing under Belinda's window. How pleased she'll be!" And that was just what he did. He waited until he was sure the Bunny family had come home. Hiding behind a bush near their home, he saw them pop, one by one, through their doorway. And then, just as the sun peeped over the hills, he began his sad song. He made frightful sounds. And pretty soon he heard Miss Bunny's mother speak to Miss Bunny's father. "William Henry!" she cried. "What's that awful noise?" Mr. Bunny must have been very sleepy. It was some time before he looked out of the door and blinked in the gray morning light. "It must have been the wind that you heard howling," he told Mrs. Bunny, who peered over his shoulder. "No!" said she. "I'm sure it was somebody in great pain." "Then he must be feeling better," replied Mr. Bunny in a bored voice. He was eager to get back to bed. "I don't hear him any more."

My Marriage Problems

Why Harry Underwood's Presence Doubly Perplexed Madge. I made a good breakfast in spite of the fact that I knew Harry Underwood in his disguise of the Castilian grandee, Don Ramon Almiraz, was covertly watching both Claire Foster and when I guessed, distinct amusement mingled with the concern which had brought him to this mountain resort. And Claire, with her anxiety upon the score of Herbert Pettit relieved by my assurance that nothing more unpleasant should come near her, ate most heartily. I saw, with satisfaction at my own success in calming her, that her youth and resilient spirits were fast reacting to the rescue from gossip my coming to the Barker home had afforded her. She was a most attractive picture. I decided as I looked at her with eyes sharpened by the realization that Harry Underwood was taking in every detail of her appearance. I would have been less than human, other than feminine, if there had not come to me the humorous remembrance of that last hectic time when Dr. Pettit and Harry Underwood had met each other. After the physician had left, I had told Mr. Underwood of his engagement to Claire Foster, and that something had broken it off. "Probably Claire came out from the other," Harry Underwood had drawled, and in the next minute had exclaimed with a dramatic flourish: "And the man who breathed the same air as you, and then became engaged to a western girl!" The words had annoyed me because they recalled the fact that before Claire Foster appeared on the horizon Dr. Pettit had fancied himself in love with me, and had given me many unpleasant minutes by the exhibition of his feelings. But, inconsistently enough, I found myself wondering if Mr. Underwood would pronounce the same verdict upon us now that he had seen Claire. Madge Pays Both Bills. With a little start and a mental cuffling of my own ears, I subdued the absurd mental vagaries in which I had been indulging, and rose from the table. "Finish your coffee," I said to my breakfast companion. "I'll settle with Mrs. Barker for both of us, if you don't want to talk to her." "I'll be so glad to do it," she said, opening her purse and handing me some bills. "There's only this last week, anyway. She is paid up until then. And there will probably be some extras. But I won't question her bill. Pay her anything she asks." "I don't fancy she'll overcharge," I returned. "You're an incurable optimist," Claire retorted, and I heard a faint sound, which I was sure was a suppressed chuckle from Harry Underwood's table. "I'm Glad to Do This." I walked down the room to the door and was compelled to pass with in two feet of the table behind which sat the pseudo Don Ramon Almiraz, looking every inch the Castilian grandee. I kept my eyes strictly averted from him, however, for I knew that Claire Foster's eyes and brain were keen, and I did not care to have her suspect the disguise. Mrs. Barker was at her desk in the front hall, and when I paid both bills, I guessed that she had hard work to keep back the caustic comments concerning Claire which I knew were near her lips. But she contented herself with a single sentence: "I'm glad to do this," as her pen made a vicious flourish under her signature receipting the girl's bill. Wisely, I made no comment upon her little speech. Instead, I tried to express my thanks to her for the in dubitable kindness she had shown me. But she waved them away impatiently. "I do what I think is right," she said crisply. "Don't waste time trying to thank me. I think you say you had a note you wanted to give me." I signalled her to silence, for Claire Foster had left the dining room, and was coming along the hall. She would not have to pass the desk, for the corridor turned abruptly a few feet from us, but she was within earshot, and I was not yet ready to confirm the girl's suspicion that Herbert Pettit was in the office.

Economy Problems. By JEAN TRUE. How much time do you spend reading your morning paper? Are you wasting time over the teacups reading the least important news? Try to see just how many minutes you really need to take to digest what is really worth reading in your paper. Do you glance at some headlines only, skin some paragraphs, and read others? Do you analyze the parts of your paper and decide what is worth while to you? How much time do you spend on the latest scandal, divorce, murder, society, sports, editorials, foreign and domestic affairs? What kind of a person are you when you read the morning paper? See if you can not form a habit of reading more rapidly, with a close concentration, a keener sense of the worth while news. Try to improve your method of reading and be a reformer along this line if you find you are wasting needless minutes over your morning paper. Plan this time to be spent and see if you cannot work to your plans with decided gain in time and information.
