TAKE SALTS IF STOMACH ISN'T ACTING RIGHT

Undigested food delayed in the stomach decays, or rather ferments, the same as food left in the open air, says
a noted authority. He also tells us that indigestion is caused by Hyperacidity meaning there is an excess of hydrochloric acid in the stomach which prevents complete digestion and starts food fermentation. Thus everything eaten sours in the stomach
much like garbage sours in a can.
fermenting acid fluids and gases which inflate the stomach like a toy balloon.
Then we feel a heavy, lumpy misery
in the chest; we belch up gas; we eructate
sour food or have heartburn, flatulence, water-brash or nausea.

He tells us to lay aside all digestive aids and instead get from any pharmacy four ounces of Jad Salts
and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast and drink
it while it is effervescing, and furthermore, to continue this for a week.
While relief often follows the first
dose, it is important to help neutralize
the acidity, remove the gas making mass, start the liver, stimulate the kidneys and thus promote a free flow
of pure digestive juices.

Jad Salts is inexpensive and is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia and sodium phosphate. This harmless salts is used for many stomach disorders
with excellent result.

The Grand Babylon Hotel

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

PART TEN.
(Chapter VIII—Continued.)
At the end of the suite of cellars there was a glazed door, which, as could be seen, gave access to a supplemental and smaller cellar.
"Anything special in there?" asked Racksale curiously.
"Ah!" exclaimed Babylon, almost smacking his lips, "therein lies the cream of all. Among many other rare wines we have here an unrivaled vintage of Romanee-Conti, which is one of all modern Burgundies. If I remember—right, Prince Eugen invariably has a bottle when he comes to stay here. It is not on the hotel wine list, of course, and only a few customers know of it."
"Indeed?" said Racksale. "Let us go inside."
They entered the stone apartment, rendered almost sacred by the preciousness of its contents, and Racksale looked round with a strangely intent and curious air. At the far side was a door, through which came a feeble light.
"What is that?" asked the millionaire sharply.
"That is merely a ventilation grate. Good ventilation is absolutely essential."
"Looks broken, doesn't it?" Racksale suggested, and then, putting a finger quickly on Babylon's shoulder, "Here's some one in the cellar. Can't you hear breathing, down there, behind that bin?"
The two men stood tense and silent for a while, listening. At length Racksale walked firmly down the central passage way between the bins and turned to the corner at the right.
"Come quickly on, villain!" he said in a low, well-nigh vicious tone, and dragged up a covering figure. He had expected to find a man, but it was his own daughter, Nella Racksale, upon whom he had laid angry hands. "Well, father," Nella greeted her astounded parent. "You should make sure that you have got hold of the right person before you use all that terrible muscular force of yours. I do believe you have broken my shoulder-bone." She rubbed her shoulder with a comical expression of pain, and then stood up before the two men. The skirt of her dark gray dress was torn and dirty, and the usually trim Nella looked as though she had been shot down a canvas fire escape.

"May I inquire what you are doing in my wine cellar, Nella Racksale?" said the millionaire a little stiffly.
"I will tell you," said Nella, "I had been reading rather late in my room and went out on the balcony of my window for a little fresh air before going to bed. I looked down into the little sunken yard which separates the wall of the hotel from Salisbury lane. I was rather astonished to see a figure creeping across the yard, and I knew there was no person in the hotel from that yard, and, besides, it is fifteen or twenty feet below the level of the street. So I watched. The figure went close up against the wall, and disappeared from my view. I leaned over the balcony as far as I dared, but I couldn't see him. I could not hear him, however."
"What could you see?" questioned Racksale, sharply.
"It sounded like a sawing noise," said Nella; "and it went on for quite a long time—nearly a quarter of an hour. I should think, a rasping sort of noise. At length it stopped, and the figure reappeared, crossed the yard, climbed up the opposite wall and over the railings into Salisbury lane. I felt rather queer, because I had known he hadn't actually broken into the hotel. He walked down Salisbury lane. By cricking your neck from my window, Mr. Babylon, you can get a glimpse of the embankment on the river. I saw the man cross the embankment, and lean over the river wall, where he seemed to be talking to some one who walked past. I saw the embankment to Westminster, and that was the last I saw of him."
"I waited a minute or two, but he didn't come back, and so I thought I was about time to begin to make inquiries into the affair. I went down stairs and out of the hotel, into Salisbury lane, and I looked over the other side. There was a ladder on the other side, and I was horribly afraid lest some one might walk up Salisbury lane and catch me in the act of negotiating those railings, but no one did, and I surmised that, because of worse damages than a torn skirt. I crossed the yard on tiptoe, and I found that in the wall, close to the ground, and almost exactly under my window, there was an iron grate, and about one foot by fourteen inches. I suspected, as there was no other ironwork near, that the mysterious visitor must have been sawing at this grate. I gave it a good shake and I was not at all surprised that a good part of it came in my hand, leaving just enough room for a person to creep through. I was so glad that I hadn't, I thought I should perish in that grate, and, with my shoulder inside and the rest of me outside. However, I pushed myself through and fell into this cellar. First of all I replaced the broken grate, then I struck a match, and saw that I had got landed in a wilderness of bottles. The match went out, and I had no other one. So I sat down in the corner and waited, and then you came in, and then you were here."

"Well, Nell, my girl," said the millionaire at length, "we are much obliged for your symmetrical efforts—very much obliged. There is going to be some serious trouble here, Mr. Babylon informs me that Jules is in London. Do you think that the man you saw might have been Jules?"
"I hardly so previously thought of him as being Jules, but I somehow know that he was. Yes, I am sure it was Jules."
"There is no time to lose. If he is coming at all he will be here very soon—and you can help." Racksale explained what he thought Jules' tactics might be. He proposed that if the man returned he should not be inter-fered with, but merely watched from the other side of the glass door. "I will leave you and Nella here," he said, "I will slip off at once. All you have to do is to take note of what the fellow does. If you lock the door on the outside he can't escape this way; the panes of glass are too small, and he would knock them to atoms."
In another moment Felix Hgbylon and Nella were left to themselves in the darkness of the cellar, listening to the receding footsteps of Theodor Racksale. But the sound of those footsteps had not died away before another sound greeted their ears—the grating of the small cellar was being removed. A man cautiously but very firmly worked his body through the aperture of the grate. The watchers could only see his form indistinctly in the darkness. Then, he turned fairly into the cellar, he walked without the least hesitation to the electric switch and turned on the light. It was unmistakably Jules, and he knew the geography of the cellar very well. Jules went directly to a small bin and took therefrom the topmost bottle.
"The Romanee-Conti—Prince Eugen's wine!" Babylon exclaimed under his breath.
Jules neatly and quickly removed the seal with an instrument which he had brought for the purpose. He then took a little flat box from his pocket, which seemed to contain a sort of black paste and with this he smeared the top of the neck of the bottle. Just where the cork came against the glass. In another instant he had deftly replaced the seal and restored the bottle to its position. He turned off the light, and he walked for the aperture. When he was half-way through Nella exclaimed, "Dad has not had time—we must stop him."
But Babylon forcibly but nevertheless politely, restrained this Yankee girl, whom he deemed so rash and inherent, and before she could free herself the little form of Jules had disappeared.

CHAPTER IX.
The Steam Launch.
As regards Theodor Racksale, who was to have caught his man from the outside of the cellar, he made his way as rapidly as possible from the wine cellars, up to the ground floor, out of the hotel by the quadrangle, through the quadrangle, and out into the top of Salisbury lane. As he was in the act of scaling the wall, a policeman seized him. In vain Theodor expostulated, explained, anatomized. Only one thing would save the policeman—that Racksale should return with him to the hotel and there establish his identity. So Theodor had no alternative but to accept the suggestion. To prove himselfly was, of course, the work of only a few minutes, after which Racksale, annoyed but cool as ever, returned to his railings. As he came down the lane he saw a figure walking about fifty yards in front of him toward the embankment. Instantly he divined that it was Jules. He ran, and Jules, hearing the noise of pursuit, ran also. The ex-waiter was fleet; he made direct for a certain spot in the embankment wall, and to the intense astonishment of Racksale, jumped clean over the wall, as if it seemed into the river. A second later he was up and sport of a steam launch told that Jules was quite capable of suicide. As the millionaire crossed the embankment roadway he saw the funnel of the launch move out from under the river wall. It swerved into midstream and headed towards London bridge.

On the following day Racksale sought out Prince Aribert and disclosed to him the happenings of the previous night, and particularly of his tampering with the bottle of Romanee-Conti. "If Prince Eugen asks for Romanee-Conti to be served tonight," he said, "I propose that that precise bottle shall be served to him—and to you."
"Then you would poison us in spite of ourselves?"
"Scarcely," Racksale smiled. "My notion is to discover the acceptable within the hotel. The bottle is now under examination by an expert, who has instructions to remove as little as possible of the stuff which Jules took out of the mouth of it. It will be secretly replaced in its bin during the day. My idea is that by the mere action of pouring, the wine takes up the poison, which I deem to be very strong and thus becomes fatal as it enters the glass."
That night Prince Aribert dined with his august nephew in the superb dining room of the royal apartments. The famous and unassailable Romanee-Conti Burgundy was served with the roast. Old Hans, Prince Eugen's personal attendant, brought it tenderly in its wicker cradle, inserted the corkscrew with mathematical precision, and drew the cork, which he offered for his master's inspection. Eugen nodded, and told him to put it down. Aribert watched with intense interest. Hans perfunctorily dusted his napkin round the neck of the bottle of Romanee-Conti, and poured out a glass, and handed it to the prince and held it to the light.
"Don't drink it," said Aribert very quietly. "It is poisoned."
"Poisoned?" exclaimed Prince Eugen.
"Poisoned, sire?" exclaimed old Hans, with an air of profound amazement and concern, and he seized the glass. "Impossible, sire. To say that this wine is poisoned is to say that I am a murderer. I will prove to you that it is not poisoned. I will drink it."
Springing up from his seat, Aribert knocked the glass from the aged ser-vant's hands. The prince and the servant gazed at one another in silence. There was a slight noise, and Aribert looked at his watch. Prince Eugen's body had slipped forward limply over the left arm of his chair; his arms hung straight and lifeless; his eyes were closed; he was unconscious.

Figures Show Low Auto Death Rate in Omaha
With the opening of the 18th annual automobile show at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon came statistics from the Chamber of Commerce bureau of publicity to show that fewer people are killed by automobiles in Omaha than in 13 other cities of the country which compare closely with Omaha in population.
Twenty deaths were caused by automobiles in Omaha during 1922, according to these figures, in Atlanta, Ga., 30; Denver, 64; Grand Rapids, Mich., 23; Hartford, Conn., 29; Kansas City, Mo., 57; Louisville, Ky., 29; Milwaukee, Wis., 32; Minneapolis, Ore., 29; New Haven, Conn., 33; Portland, Ore., 34; Providence, R. I., 38, and Toledo, 46.
In 1921 28 deaths were caused by automobiles in Omaha and in 1920, 38. The diminishing of the death rate is attributed in part to the vigilance of volunteer citizen "cops" who work under the direction of the traffic safety committee.
