

World Court Seen as Big Issue in 1924 Campaign

Action of Congress Key to Outcome of Plan for U. S. Taking Part in International Court.

Both publicly and within party councils Cox talks out where others "fussfoot."

Cox during his 1920 campaign became saturated with the league of nations. It gripped him. He became a devotee. He took on a sort of evangelistic fervor about it. Cox preaching the league of nations during the closing weeks of the 1920 campaign had as much fervor as Billy Sunday preaching the Ten Commandments.

This identity with the league, and this absorption in it, which Cox acquired during the campaign, is still with him. Some of the fervor, some of the evangelistic exaltation disappeared in the cold shock of the morning after, when the overwhelming quality of his defeat was recorded. But what Cox lost in fervor he has since made up in a quiet access of tenacity.

Cox's study during the two years and some months since he was defeated has led him to believe that a universal association for the prevention of war is the one and only instrument that can save the world. He has set up his office in Dayton and watched the world pass through crisis after crisis and effort after effort to work a cure. He has tested each crisis by the formula of the league of nations, contrasted each failure to cure with what might have been done through the league, and has settled day by day more firmly in the conviction that sooner or later the world must come around to the league as the only way out.

He holds this belief as something fundamental, in the same spirit that he holds to the simple business principles on which he runs his newspapers.

But Cox, without much doubt, while he believes the underlying principle of the league to be the only sound one, has no preconception about the original form of it. It can be taken for granted that he would accept amendments, and would be content, or might even himself propose, that the next democratic platform should stand for a modification of the league.

It is a question, however, just how much power Cox will have in the next democratic convention and what his role will be. He may possibly cut a considerable figure in the platform-making, as an earnest advocate of courage about this matter of foreign relations.

But as regards the nomination for the presidency, any one who looks at the democratic situation as it exists today, in terms of the actual facts and in terms of the attitude of important leaders, is compelled to set down the conclusion that Cox is out of it for 1924. It is not possible for any survey of the situation as it exists today to see any likelihood of Cox having as many as a hundred delegates out of the 1,089 who compose the democratic convention.

The reasons for the eclipsing of Cox are two. One obvious one is the overwhelming character of his defeat in 1920. That alone is a serious handicap.

Further than this, Cox in that campaign did not make the kind of impression and did not enlist the kind of personal following based on affectionate loyalty to a dashing leader, such as might have enabled him to salvage as much out of defeat as some other men have saved out of similar disasters. Cox did not come to the end of the 1920 campaign as Bryan, for example, came to the end of his equally disastrous 1896 campaign—defeated, but nevertheless with a degree of popular affection and devotion which enabled him to get two subsequent nominations.

But even more fatal to Cox than these reasons is the fact that there has grown up among some of the democratic leaders a disaffection toward Cox personally, which in some cases is stronger than their emotion of devotion to him in 1920. Some of the leaders who were at the very heart of the Cox movement, some of the individuals who were most responsible for Cox's nomination, are not now friendly to him. On the contrary, they are strongly opposed to him. This statement includes men whose names are not widely familiar to the public but whom politicians will recognize by the description.

Part of the reason for this present disaffection toward Cox on the part of the leaders who got him the 1920 nomination lies in the fact that Cox, after he got the nomination, did some things against the urgent advice of these leaders. A few of these leaders (and it should be made clear that this does not apply to all of them) wanted Cox to be "wet," and he did not do that. A few wanted him to dissociate himself from Wilson and the league of nations, whereas Cox's first step in the campaign was to visit Wilson at the White House and to espouse the league most strongly.

But the present disaffection toward Cox includes leaders who approved his refusal to be "wet" and his endorsement of Wilson and the league, leaders who completely approved the way Cox conducted his campaign. As to these men, the reason for their present attitude toward Cox is largely personal. It is based on human factors, things that have arisen in their personal relations.

This disaffection against Cox exists in his own state, among democratic leaders in the state who have a strong voice in the direction of democratic affairs. Without going into a local state political situation in too much detail, it can be said that Cox at present is decidedly on the outside of the Ohio democratic organization and is the object of strong disapproval on the part both of leaders within the organization and other strong men outside the organization.

Last fall, when it became apparent that the Ohio democrats could win the governorship, some five different men wanted the governorship nomination and set out to get it. Naturally, each of them sought the aid of so conspicuous a man as Cox. In the ensuing clash of personalities and factions Cox seems to have failed to avoid getting himself rather badly mauled. For this and other reasons the situation is such that if Cox should go out next year to get the delegates from his own state he would encounter strong opposition.

In the event that other candidates, such as McAdoo, or Ford, or Ralston, or Underwood, should decide to contest Ohio, Cox might readily lose a considerable number of the state's 48 delegates. And even if Cox should get the nominal endorsement of his personnel of the delegation, the actual individuals who will go to the convention, will be unfriendly to Cox. They will be in the state of mind that will give a perfunctory vote to Cox, but will actually be opposed to him. After voting for Cox long enough to fulfill their bare obligations they will turn to some one else. The net of it is that in all probability Cox will neither have the Ohio delegation for himself—except in possibly a perfunctory sense—nor will he in any degree whatever control it in the sense of being able to swing it to other men. In short, as things now stand, Cox seems unlikely to cut much figure as a possibility himself and also unlikely to have much weight in determining who else is to be the nominee. That is how things stand with Cox today. But he is a tenacious and resourceful man. He may, during the next 12 months, be able to pull himself out of his present position of impotency. Cox, no less than McAdoo, illustrates the old saying that "you can't keep a squirrel on the ground." The sentiment for Henry Ford continues to be not less than has been described in these articles from time to time for more than a year past. On the contrary, it grows. The following paragraph is from a personal letter from one of the most competent political observers in the middle west, one who has no particular affection for Ford—one who, indeed, fears that the Ford movement, if it continues to develop, will be accompanied by agitation for some hair-raising economic and financial heresies:

body is going to take the works apart and give 'em a good cleaning, and I detect a growing feeling in these parts that, as long as somebody is going to do it, Ford would be as likely to put the mechanism back into working order without losing any of the necessary parts as anybody. I wouldn't be a bit surprised if we were in for it."
