Giants Class of National

League Clubs

By DAVIS J. WALSH.

New York, April 2 .- Judged upon surface indications, the National league situation has changed about as much as the undertaker's profes-sional smile since early October. The New York Giants were too much for the rest of the field at that time, much to much, and between seasons they are believed to have taken on additional strength while the other clubs have improved their condition but slightly if at all.

If fate rules otherwise, the Giants figure to cakewalk right on down to the wire for their third successive pennant.

We are not, however, picking winners at this stage of the proceedings merely voicing what seems to be a palpable conclusion, there seemingly being neither necessity nor sense in concealing or evading this fact. Giants Stronger.

The world's champions are the same impressive outfit that succeeded front-running the pack through the last two months of the 1922 season, with these exceptions:

They are assured of sounder, more consistent pitching because Scott and McQuillan are available for the entire season and Jack Bentley is regarded as being able to deliver $65,-000 worth of left hand pitching; Heine Groh, out of many games with a demountable knee, is whole again, and finally the addition of Jimmy O'Connell, the human interrogation

Once an inquiry is pursued beyond nicely balanced and a possible seventh place club today may be running second in September.

A general house cleaning has set in with the Dodgers and a berth near the head of the second division should be theirs, particularly with the kind of pitching they can muster. They will have pitchers as long as your Uncle Robby remains with the club. The Phils and Braves are probably slightly improved outfits, but they have irremediable weaknesses that seem to consign them to the second division quite definitely. The Phils have not pitching, the Braves very little and neither is sufficiently endowed in other respects to offset this

Q. A bets B that all space within the limits of a sandtrap is regarded as a part of the hazard and that a ball that stops within these limits must be so treated. B claims that where patches of terf are growing within these limits, even though they are entirely surrounded by sand, he is entitled to ground his club in addressing the ball, if it stops on one of the patches of grass Which is right?

A. B is correct. However, wherever such conditions as these exist, it is the day of the club to establish a local rule clearing up such points.

Q. In a medal qualifying round a player played his ball into a wide patch of sandy waste which was considered a hazard. He was unable to find the ball after a five minutes' search, so teed another ball back of the hazard with a penaity of two strokes, on the ground that he could lift from any place on the course under such a penaity, and played the hole out. Was be entitled to do this? If not, what was the penaity?

A. The player was disqualified. The role which permits lifting a ball from an unplayable lie has been interpreted to presuppose that the ball was lost other than in a water hazard, and should have been so treated.

Q. Just to settle a little friendly argument, is it correct to refer to a player

These were the only points that Harvard scored against Yale through four years, as the campaigns of 1910 and 1911 were scoreless duels. Four points against Yale in four years-and yet Harvard stood pat, backing Haughton to the limit. Haughton has a far harder asisgnment at Columbia than he ever had at Harvard and his only chance to succeed will be through the complete cooperation of his new football home and at least a fair share of patience.

Having won a pennant every four years since 1915, Pat Moran can see no reason why he should give up the pleasant habit this late in life. Pat pulled the Phillies through in 1915, and the Reds over in 1919. And it so nappens in 1923 that McGraw picks him as the most dangerous party in the way of the Giants and a third world series pot. Pat, given the material, can usually make it hum. This year he has it again.
