

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

The Secret About Herself That Mrs. Durkee Told Madge.

At the sight of little Mrs. Durkee's sudden, contorted face and swaying figure I pushed my chair back and sprang to her side, holding her closely.

"What is it, dear?" I asked. "What has I got you? Let me put you down on the couch."

"No, no." She stiffened in protest. "That makes it worse. Just hold me tight. Oh-h-h! the pain."

"I saw the great beads of perspiration start out upon her forehead, heard her little moaning cries, and knew that she must be suffering intense agony, for 'Her Fluffiness,' despite her childlike ways, is one of the gamiest little women I know."

But I attempted no aid except holding her as she requested, until after an interval which seemed endless, but which in reality was only a minute, the tension of her figure loosened and she sagged in arms with a long-drawn shuddering sigh of relief.

"You—can—put—me—down—now," she said, and I half led, half carried her to the couch, and lead her tenderly upon it.

In utter exhaustion she closed her eyes, and covering her warmly, I sat down beside her, and took her cold, shaking little hands between mine, holding them firmly. For perhaps five minutes we remained thus, and then her eyes—still beautiful despite her years, always reminding me of wood violets—opened widely and looked at me.

"Tell Me Where It Is."

"This is why I came to you, Madge," she said. "I had to tell someone. I couldn't stand this pain any longer, and Leila would be frightened to death if she knew. She's as nervous as a cat, anyway. Leila is, and she isn't one bit well, either. I told Alf he ought not to have her come in to town yesterday, but he had his mind set on a blowout with you people, and, of course, she was as crazy to go. And this morning he telephoned that she was so tired he was going to make her stay in bed at the hotel until this afternoon. He'll bring her out home tonight after dinner, and I grabbed the chance to come in to see you. Don't you think Leila looks sick?"

"She doesn't look well, certainly," I replied slowly, "but I fancy it's nerves rather than physical illness. With you, however, it's something more than nerves, so, if you please, we'll drop Leila for a while. Tell me, what is the matter with you?"

"She looked up in my face with eyes that held frightened appeal. 'I wish I knew,' she said. 'Dr. Pringle has been away for weeks. I've been waiting for him, until I don't dare wait any longer.'"

"I'm glad he's away!" I burst out vehemently, and was sorry for my outburst a second afterward. For Dr. Pringle, an elderly practitioner of Marvins, who, to my mind, was no better than a well-meaning but ignorant quack, was the only physician in whom little Mrs. Durkee had any confidence. I could not bear the idea of her consulting him upon anything vital, but I knew that any criticism of him was a flaunting of the traditional red rag, and I had no wish to excite her.

Her cheeks flew danger flags immediately. "I might have known you'd say that," she said crossly. "But I can tell you, Madge Graham, he's just the finest doctor anywhere around. He's pulled me through sickness many a time. And I'd a great deal rather take his word than that skinny Pettit with a ramrod for a spine."

I laughed at her temper outburst. It was impossible to do anything else. And though at first she pouted, it was but a second before she was smiling with me.

"But I wouldn't take Dr. Pettit's word where a mysterious and severe pain like this is concerned," I argued after a minute. "It seems to me a matter for a specialist. Tell me where it is."

"Mrs. Durkee Is Terrified." She raised her arm and indicated a spot in her side.

"It'll help me undo my dress. I'll show you the exact place," she said.

I gave her the aid she wished and the result of my inspection and of two or three questions I asked her turned me fairly faint with the sense of a horrible revelation over the head of my dear little friend.

I smoothed all emotion out of my face, however, before I lifted it so that she could see it. But it was all I could do to keep from betraying my terror for her when she suddenly seized my hands and wailed pitifully. "Don't say you think it's that, Madge." And I knew that in her thoughts was the same terrified fear of a certain mysterious and often incurable malady which had sprung into my own mind.

Uncle Sam Says

Care of Food in the Home.

Care of food in the home is not only necessary to economical living, but it also is essential to the protection of life itself, for while both animal and vegetable food allowed to be attacked by bacteria without hindrance breaks up into a loathsome mass well known to most housekeepers, food also becomes dangerous from ptomaines, hardly recognizable except by laboratory test, even before it shows outward signs of decomposition.

This booklet which is issued by the Federal States Relations service tells of the protection of food, both before and after cooking, and is an aid to one of the most important duties of the housekeeper.

Readers of The Bee may obtain a copy of this booklet free as long as the free addition lasts by writing to the Division of Publications, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., asking for "F. B. 375."

Beatrice Fairfax Problems That Perplex

Dear Miss Fairfax: I am a girl 27 years old, and have had a number of love experiences which are going to culminate next month in marriage with Mister Right Man. By love experiences I do not mean anything cheap because I have had ideals, and have kept them, I am glad to say.

One of the affairs which led indirectly to the problem which I now bring to you, was a stormy engagement which though wrong, gave me considerable woe to break. I moved to a different city to forget, and there was employed by a very rich man who took a genuine brotherly interest in me. We went together in the most companionable way for two years, and of course he knew considerable about my affairs, financial and otherwise. I have a genuine knack with the needle and got together costumes that could be worn to the most expensive places, and fashionable clubs, all I lacked was the emphasis of refinement something really expensive could give.

One evening after a little speech in which he mentioned his unsentimental interest in me, he gave me a handsome diamond and platinum bar pin, and on another occasion a platinum watch.

Of course I only wore them to the fashionable places, rather than cause talk.

Last year I met a good man, with whom I really fell in love, quietly and deeply. He asked me to marry him and I was glad to consent, because I love him with all that is fine in me, and know that with him I will find happiness, for both of us.

Now, Miss Fairfax, he knows about the jewels and wishes me to return them. I am no longer in the employ of the man who gave them to me, and since I parted from him with the utmost amiability, and a flood of sincere good wishes on his part, I think I am entitled to them. The more so since we will leave town after our marriage.

We are poor. My husband will not ever make much of a salary, since he is not trained. I will always work, but of course I will be happy with him anyway because I love him. Still since these jewels represent so much to me and so little to the man who gave them I think I would be foolish to return them. Can you help me?

LOVER OF PRETTY THINGS. Like most people who ask perplexing problems, you have answered yourself. I am not going to give you my opinion today, however, but will refer this letter to our readers. I hope they will write to me and let me publish their replies to you. Then when they are through, I will give you my advice.

Will Look Their Best. After dusting bronze apply a little sweet oil and then rub briskly with a chamois skin. This will bring them out in rich tones.

Shoe supplies the most suitable sheet brass for making brass musical instruments.

Colored Slippers. The average woman who approaches the choice of evening clothes is anxious about slippers and stockings. She regards these adjuncts as more important than sleeves and jewelry. And again, in these details she has a wide choice. The plain silver and gold slipper is substituted by brocaded silk and velvet, with preference given to the latter. The fantastic Cleopatra sandal appears everywhere. Last year each woman felt that she must have an ornamental strapped sandal with a high heel when she went out after dark; now she realizes that the American pump, as it is called, is not only in fashion, but is preferred by a large sector of women who dress well. Shoemakers are launching the colored slipper to match the gown. It will succeed, probably. However, it is not economical unless a woman limits her evening clothes to one color. The brocaded slipper with smoke, cinnamon or nude stockings is the most economical footwear fashion that has been instituted since bare feet were taboo in good society. The beige stocking is not as smart as those of smoke and taupe, and all evening stockings are as transparent as cobwebs.

Mr. W. L. Lawler of Alabama says: "This is one of the greatest tonics for vitality, digestion and liver trouble. A general builder for run-down persons. It made me an entirely new man at 55. I feel like I am only 30 years of age today."

Another steadies the nerves and helps to overcome sleeplessness, irritability and nervous depression. There is not an ailing part of the body which does not feel the benefit of Lyko.

HOME REMEDIES OF OUR ANCESTORS. Almost every man and woman in America can remember the botanical recipes of our mothers and grandmothers for the treatment of disease, and they were wonderfully dependable, too. Every fall there were stored away in the attic thoroughwort, pennyroyal, ostarip, sage, wormwood, rue, etc., for treating ills of the family during the winter months that followed. In 1873, Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was first prepared from one of these botanical recipes, and the demand for it has increased to such an extent that hundreds of tons of roots and herbs are now used annually in its preparation. It has been repeatedly proved that 95 out of every 100 women who try it have been benefited by its use, which is a marvelous record for any medicine to hold.
