Boxer Sees His New Relations.
By THORNTON W. BURGESS.
For jealousy there is no use. And for it there is no excuse.
—Mother Bear.

Boxer, the young Bear who had been sent out into the Great World to make his living, knew that the wisest thing for him to do would be to keep as far away as possible from the old home where Mother Bear still lived. But having discovered that there were new babies in that old home, and as a result having grown sulky and jealous, he somehow couldn't keep away from that part of the Green Forest. He didn't dare go very near the old home because he was afraid of Mother Bear. But he spent much time hanging around as near as he dared go. You see he couldn't forget those new babies. He wanted to see them and he didn't want to see them. He was so jealous that the very thought of them made him ugly.

Then one morning a great idea came to him. He didn't dare go near enough to that windfall on the ground to see it, but he might climb a tall tree and see it from there. He knew just the tree. It was a big hemlock tree. He could climb up among the upper branches and look right down on that old windfall where Mother Bear and the new babies lived. It wasn't likely that he would be seen up among the branches of that big hemlock tree. He would be quite safe up there.

So straight over to the big hemlock tree Boxer shuffled, and up he climbed. It was an easy climb for such a good climber as Boxer, and he had no trouble in getting up high enough to look down on that old windfall. Somehow he expected it to look different. He didn't know why, but he did. Of course, it didn't look different. It looked just the same as it always had.

All was quiet there. For a long time there wasn't a sign of life around it. Boxer wondered if Mother Bear was at home. He wondered how big those babies were. He was sure there were two, for he had heard two cries that morning when he had discovered that there were babies in the old home.

For a long time Boxer kept his perch up in that big hemlock tree. At last he began to grow tired. He had just about made up his mind to climb down when he saw his mother look out of the entrance under the old windfall. Boxer held his breath and waited. In a few moments Mother Bear came out. She sat up and looked this way, and that way, and the other way, and held her nose out so as to catch every scent the Merry Little Breezes might bring. After what seemed a long, long time to Boxer she seemed to make up her mind that all was well. She dropped down on all four feet, turned and made a funny little sound at the entrance under the old windfall.

At once a funny little face appeared there. Then out came a cub, a cub so small that Boxer couldn't believe he himself had ever been as small as that. Hardly was this one out when another appeared. Neither one was very much bigger than Peter Rabbit.

"I knew there were two," muttered Boxer to himself.

Mother Bear touched them gently with her nose. Even at that distance Boxer could see that she was very proud of them. Then she turned again to the entrance and once more made the funny little sound. A second later Boxer nearly fell from his perch with surprise. Out of that entrance came another baby Bear just a wee bit smaller than the other two! Mother Bear had triplets! Yes, sir, Mother Bear had triplets.

IRONIZE More Foods

One of the body's daily needs is food-iron for the blood.

Raisins furnish iron—the natural, organic iron which is most easily assimilated by the system.

Add raisins, therefore, to cakes, cookies, breakfast foods, bread, etc., and you add this benefit as well as luscious flavor.
