

New Cure Is Found for Child Disease

Submersion in Water Treatment for Infantile Paralysis—Is Successful.

By International News Service.
Chicago, June 12.—Successful treatment of infantile paralysis by submersion of children in a tank of tepid water was announced today by the staff of the Northwestern university medical school. The method has been found so successful, it was announced, that patients formerly compelled to remain in wheel chairs are able to walk, in some instances without crutches.

A tank five feet high and six feet in diameter, much resembling a rain barrel, has been installed in the school. It is filled with water enough to submerge the legs and lower torsos of child patients.

It was installed by the father of a Chicago girl who miraculously found she was able to use her paralyzed legs for swimming when one day she was helped into the surf while undergoing treatment in the south.

The theory behind the treatment is that the afflicted arm or leg is submerged in water, support is given to the muscles and if any strength remains in them the patient can move them.

Children taking the treatment, according to the doctors, respond well to it because of the pleasure they have splashing and frisking about. They usually come out only under howling protest.

Stout the bear which knows not fright When Nature doth display her might—Mother Bear.

The Thunder Storm.
Littlest Bear was not only lonesome, but she had begun to feel strangely uneasy. It was a queer feeling. She didn't know what to make of it. She felt as if something was going to happen, but what could happen she hadn't the slightest idea. This feeling made her even more lonesome. Never in her short life had she known such silliness. There wasn't a sound in the Green Forest. Not a leaf moved. Littlest Bear began to whimper. She whimpered softly, as if afraid of the sound of her own voice.

"I want my mother. I want my mother. I want my mother," whimpered Littlest Bear, and began to run. This strange silliness frightened her more and more. She couldn't keep still. It was easier to run. She tried to think that she was running back to where she had last seen Mother Bear. But she wasn't. You see she hadn't any idea at all where she was. She kept on running, and as she ran she kept on whimpering. "I want my mother. I want my mother."

Suddenly there was a deep, low growl, the biggest growl Littlest Bear ever had heard. She sprang to the nearest tree, but before she could start to scramble up it she remembered that she couldn't find Mother Bear if she was up in a tree. With her heart going pit-a-pat, pit-a-pat with fright, she waited to see if that dreadful rumbly, grumbly growl would be repeated. It was getting very dark, although it was not yet time for night. After waiting a moment or two, she started on again.

She had taken but a few jumps when that dreadful rumbly, grumbly growl was repeated louder than before. Once more she bolted for the nearest tree and waited. What terrible creature could it be that growled like that? Compared with it, Mother Bear's deepest, most rumbly, grumbly growl was as nothing. And this growl seemed to come from nowhere in particular, unless it was overhead.

Again Littlest Bear started to run, and now she was doing more whimpering. She was crying. Yes, sir, she was crying. It grew even darker. Then there came a flash of light that almost blinded Littlest Bear, and right after it a terrible noise. Littlest Bear hadn't supposed that there could be such a noise. She fell over her own feet. Then she scrambled up the nearest tree. Happily Jack Squirrel never went up a tree faster than Littlest Bear went up that tree. No, sir, he never did!

Right up as high as she could go she scrambled. There in a crotch her nose buried between her paws. She too frightened to even whimper. Then the rain came pouring down. There were more of those flashes of light and more of that terrible noise. It was a thunder storm. Littlest Bear's first thunder storm. She was so frightened that it seemed to her her heart would stop beating. She didn't dare move.

So there in the top of that tree Littlest Bear stayed until the storm was over. She had climbed that tree because to her a tree was the safest place for safety, and thought she really wasn't any safer, she felt safer.
