Wise Chief Sumkin.

It's all uncertain. Wealth in the ground might make Rockefeller 10 times as rich as Ford. And ideas in the back of Ford's head might be werth 10 times the oil of Rockefeller. Mellon, who is said to "know more about more kinds of business than any other man living," may possess, in his control of the aluminum business and some other things, wealth enough to buy Rockefeller and Ford.

The main thing is that all three men are engaged in developing the earth's resources. Ownership is unimportant. For these men don't squander their money. They reinvest in productive work and, as a matter of fact, the people really own it.

President Harding heard from Chief Sumkin something that might be referred to many: "I do not believe that my race is better than others. I believe that all races in this world are just as good as one another."

Chief Sumkin, of the Umatilla tribe, 87, stood before the president as straight as a rifle barrel, talking in the sign language, with another Indian translating. Fred Remington should have been there to make a picture of it.

This isn't guesswork. Thousands of cases prove it by their long lives, and hundreds of millions of cases prove it by their too short lives. The only plan for those that eat heartily at breakfast is no luncheon.

Constant migration of negroes from the south to the north is a menace to southern industry and to southern agriculture. It may also prove to be an important factor in the 1924 campaign, as in others.

In the north those colored men will all vote, and 90 per cent at least, will vote the republican ticket. Twenty-five thousand colored voters, or fewer, located in the right spot, might decide a close national election.
