remely rare with my brave, poised kinswoman—"but I didn't see even a movement of the underbrush."

"I must have been mistaken then," she said relievedly.

But the next instant there came to our ears the faint sounds of a door opening softly and instantly closed again. Its closing, however, did not shut out a shrill jabbering exclamation of frightened surprise, cut short so quickly as to bring a vision of a powerful hand clapped over the speaker's mouth.

"That was a woman's voice!" Katherine said decisively.

"Undoubtedly," I returned, "and your vision of the man bent double was no dream after all."

"Then you think—" "That it's dangerous to think out loud with people such as these. But we'll keep our eyes open. Come on."

"Are you going on in now?" she asked in surprise.

"We can't afford not to," I explained. "Some of them, no doubt, have seen us coming, and if we went back now they would suspect that we had heard or seen something which frightened us."

Katherine squared her shoulders, and I saw that she was in full command of herself again.

"Oh, we young ones!" she parodied ridiculously. "Lead on, MacDuff, for well I know you'll never yeep 'Enough!'"

I grinned appreciatively and we walked toward the ramshackle fence which enclosed the farmyard. Before we reached it a huge dog sprang from the bushes and savagely barking, ran toward us. I forced myself to stand still and face the beast, strengthened by Mrs. Ticer's assurance that the animal would not come out of the yard.

"Wait, I Ask My Man."

He fully justified Mrs. Ticer's prediction, and for fully two minutes we stood ridiculously on one side of the fence, while the dog barked and growled at us from the other. Then a frightened looking woman with bare feet thrust into a pair of men's shoes and a scanty dress fluttering in the wind, came running down to the fence, scolding the dog as she came.

"Vot you vant?" she asked, evidently having a hard struggle with the English words.

"We want to come in to see you." I chose my words purposely, and as I expected, saw her eyes flinch with the pretended misunderstanding of her type when cornered.

"Me no spik Inglish," she said, making no motion to unbar the gate.

"Who you vant see?" "I have girl—work for people."

"My girl? Yeh. You vant her?" "Yes."

"Vot for?" "Clean windows." I gave a pantomime of my meaning. "Wash floors."

I knew that Katherine was holding back her giggles as I illustrated this. "Many peoples coming our house two days. Much work. Mrs. Ticer said your girl would come."

I watched her eyes and saw that she fully understood my jaw, acquired by listening to Katie converse in English with less fluent members of her race. She considered for a few seconds, then turned toward the house with the inevitable answer of the alien woman not yet initiated into the freedom of American wives:

"Vait, I ask my man," she said.

Old Dutch takes the hard work out of cleaning

You save energy when you use Old Dutch. You save money, too. Its tiny, flat shaped, flaky particles lie flat; spread out over more surface; and erase all the dirt. Every particle cleans. That's why it's so economical. Old Dutch is a natural cleanser and contains no hard, scratchy grit to grind in the dirt and scratch the surface. There's no waste in Old Dutch, because it contains no lye or acids which are both dangerous and wasteful. They injure surfaces. They roughen your hands. They dissolve and wash away.

The Strange Sounds Both Katherine and Madge Heard.

At Katherine's demand and clutch of my arm my eyes followed hers to the copse of evergreens surrounding the house across the road from the farm.

"See what?" I queried a bit stupidly. "Then you didn't?" she answered in a disappointed tone. "I was so hoping you had. For if you had I'd have known I wasn't imagining things."

"If you'll just tell me what you thought you saw," I suggested. "That might be a good idea," she assented with a smile. "I was sure I saw a man, bent almost double, dodging through those evergreens. Didn't you see him?"

Facing the Dog.
"I'd like to oblige you," I returned, with purposeful lightness, for I saw that Katherine, shaken by her unfortunate little experience with one of Mother Graham's tantrums, was distinctly nervous—something ex-
