Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

The Way Mother Graham Planned Her Campaign.

Check and mate. I made the mental comment gleefully at the bewildered and defeated look which came into my mother-in-law's eyes at Mammie's quiet dictum. "My mother says if people don't like my name I must come home." That her mother had said nothing of the kind I was very sure. But I was also certain that the maternal-and-paternal instructions had been to seize any plausible opportunity to get away without our suspecting their reluctance to have any member of their family away from home at this particular time. And the girl, with feline quickness, had seized upon Mother Graham's slighting reference to the English diminutive she had acquired, as a convenient pretext for going home.

I knew there was but one thing which prevented my irascible mother-in-law from dismissing the girl with promptness and hauteur. This was the necessity—to her mind—of house cleaning before the arrival of the Braithwaites. She needed every possible pair of hands, and the knowledge compelled her tongue to partial acquiescence.

"Don't be foolish, girl," she said, with an intonation which had the effect of picking the girl up and depositing her a yard or two farther off. "Your name doesn't matter one way or the other. Mrs. Ticer, you're used to her, you take her to Mr. Graham's room in the wing." We'll begin there, as I told you. You'll find plenty of cleaning cloths in the right-hand drawer beneath the linen closet and the brushes and brooms are in the closet opening from the back hall. I will be up presently."

Mother Graham is Vexed. There is something about my mother-in-law, when she is in lofty mood, calculated to quell the most recalcitrant person. But I do not think the girl from across the road was in the least overawed by her. She stood perfectly still for a long minute after listening to Mother Graham's directions, palpably weighing the comparative merits of going or staying. Finally, with a little shrug, she turned to Mrs. Ticer.

"All right. I'll go with you," she said, and I wondered if I had imagined a faint stressing of the pronoun.

Mother Graham answered my mental question in the affirmative as soon as the door closed after Mrs. Ticer and the sullen Mammie. "Did you hear the impudence of that animal?" she demanded, with a look at Katherine and me, which called for instant agreement. "I had all I could do to keep from boxing her ears and sending her home. Not like her name—forsooth! Cattle like those haven't any business with names anyway. I'd number 'em, if I had my way."

Despite her medieval sentiments, I noticed that she kept her voice discreetly lowered so that it would not be audible beyond the living room, and I knew that until the house cleaning was accomplished, Katie and Mrs. Ticer, as well as the delectable Mammie, would be safe from my mother-in-law's caustic little she-declared.

"We'll invade the kitchen," I knew also, and was thankful for the knowledge, that Dicky's mother required no answer to her question. She had asked it simply as a means of letting off the steam of her irritation against the composed Mammie, and was off on another tack before the words of her question were fairly out of her mouth.

"It's mighty lucky you're here for these days, Margaret," she observed.

Come to Clear Lake

The Savanna of the West

"You can get the meals, and leave Katie free for the cleaning."

Unless it was, however, as I very well knew, to betray resentment or dissent. My mother-in-law in her present mood would ignore either manifestation loftily, and go resolutely along the path she had marked out. With an air of finality she moved toward the door, stopping with her hand upon the knob to give her last instructions.

"Send Katie to me directly and be sure to keep Richard Second in the kitchen with you. He'll be safe from drafts there. Perhaps Mrs. Bickett will lend you a hand with the dinner."

"Mrs. Bickett will just do that little earshot. 'Come along, Midge, we'll thing.'" Katherine laughed when Mother Graham was safely out of our old-time larks getting dinner."

Tastes vary

Some people like their mayonnaise "thick," some like it thin. MacLaren's Mayonnaise has a "thick" creamy body which can easily be thinned by adding sweet cream to suit, so it meets both requirements. In short, you can use MacLaren's Mayonnaise for any purpose or in any way that you would a home-made dressing.
