regards with suspicion any personable man who evinces the slightest interest in her son's wife.

Madge Reassures Jim.

Jim's face was a study of alarmed bewilderment. I had instructed him to deliver the package to me without its being seen by anyone else, and he evidently had met the Ticers before he had a chance to conceal it.

As long as Mother Graham must be told about Harry Underwood, I was glad to make a confidante of Katherine.

"I'll send Mrs. Ticer down right ly as she went out of the room, and I hastened to give Jim something to do.

With a look of relief Jim obediently hustled the Ticers to his own quarters and Katherine and I arranged places for the Ticer family at one end of the dining table.

"This doesn't seem right, ladies," she said, smiling as we ushered her to her seat. "I'm not used to being waited on like this."

"It's time you became used to it, then," I retorted smiling, for I have a genuine liking for my kindly neighbor.

"Well, we've flaxed around quite a bit," she admitted. "And in spite of all our interruptions we have all the work finished which your mother-in-law laid out. So everything's quiet along the Potomac."

A whimsical smile played around her lips as she phrased the reference so often uttered by a former generation, and I guessed that the accomplishment of my energetic mother-in-law's directions had been no easy task.

Jerry Ticer put an effectual end to any further questions or comments, and even if I had wished to make them, I served them diligently.

"I'll attend to the clearing up and getting the table back into shape for our dinner," Katherine whispered, as we were getting ready to serve the dessert. "You'd better go upstairs with curiosity."

But the ability to make a dressing for it, and make it good every time, is a gift. Few have it. Too often the dressing is a "hit or miss" result—with more "miss" than "hit."
