High, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon league, produced further figures to prove his charge to Governor Bryan that Police Judge William Wappich of Omaha, was not properly enforcing the liquor law. "I have just received copies of Judge Wappich's record for the month of August," High said. "It shows that 103 liquor cases were before him, that 42 were dismissed and one man received a sentence of five days in jail. The other cases, or a majority of them, went to the federal court."

"The governor's defense for failure to investigate Judge Wappich and Dineen because it is purely an Omaha affair and I am living in Lincoln seems absurd. It isn't the Anti-Saloon league of Lincoln, it is the Anti-Saloon league of Nebraska, just as Governor Bryan is the governor of the entire state and is supposed to see that the laws are enforced in Omaha as well as outside of Omaha."

"In refusing to act, the governor isn't only defying the Anti-Saloon league but also a number of the most prominent citizens of Omaha who have, through letters or personal interviews, implored him to take some action to clean up the Omaha situation."

Two additional bodies were found at the scene of the wreck of the seven destroyers at Omaha yesterday, making the total so far recovered six. One body found today was that of S. J. Overhiser of San Jose, who was a fireman on the Young. The other body has not been identified. The clothing was marked "Stall." The naval officers and men say that these garments may have been borrowed, as there is no man named Stall on the list of missing. It also developed yesterday that the identification of the body thought to have been that of J. S. Van Shaak probably was incorrect. Shipmates who said the body was that of Van Shaak did so because of certain tattoo marks. Now it has been found that the finger prints of the dead sailor do not correspond with those on file at San Diego.
