Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

The Way Dicky Came Home to Madge

My hope of sleep, which should banish the remembrance of the book I had read and had tortured myself into believing it was my husband, did not materialize.

I tried every expedient I knew, but I heard each quarter-hour strike from the old chimneys in a church tower nearby until a tangible anxiety was added to the imaginary one which had been terrifying me. Surely, I told myself, when 2 o'clock had sounded, the most drawn-out banquet should be over, and I knew that it was less than a half-hour's journey from the big hotel where the affair had been held, to our humble apartment.

Useless to tell myself that if my husband were the man about whom I had been reading, he was distinctly not worth worrying about, and my life would be more peaceful if he never came home. That primal emotion of woman, fear of danger to her mate, swept over me, held me tense, breathless, agonized for the hour and a half which elapsed until I heard the hall door open and close and Dicky's key in the lock.

Then with something akin to the emotion which prompts a mother to slap a child over whose disappearance she has been agonizing, I found myself unwilling to greet him kindly, or even to speak to him if I could help it, and cuddling down into the bedclothing so that there was left only an aperture for breathing. I pretended to be asleep.

A Terrifying Thought

I kept up a regular and deep breathing for several seconds after the door had opened and closed again. And then, disquietingly, I realized that Dicky had not moved after closing the door. He was standing motionless, inside the door, and I heard no sound but that of his hurried, unsteady breathing.

An utterly absurd but terrifying thought seized me. Suppose it were not Dicky standing there, but some marauder who had in some way secured a key to the room?

My pulse seemed to stop and my flesh felt icy as I faced this possibility, but I knew there was but one thing to do. With a swift movement, as noiseless as I could make it, I slipped from my bed on the opposite side from the door, and snatched on the switch of the night lamp at the head of the bed. But at what the light revealed, I forgot my absurd fear, my anger against my husband, my worry over the fact that disheveled, pallid, shaking, Dicky was leaning against the wall, either sorely hurt or desperately ill, I did not at first know. Then, even as I sprang toward him, I saw the edge of a bandage beneath his hat, and knew that he had experienced some accident.

"I'll Attend to This Myself."

I wasted no time in exclamations or questions. My long association with Lillian has schooled me in a habit which my mother's teaching began long ago. I drew up a chair to Dicky's side, and slipped my hand under his arm.

"Sit down, dear," I said softly, the caressing word involuntarily uttering itself. He slumped heavily against me, while the pallor of his face deepened. "Ded," he whispered to my relief, for knowing his reluctance to be "doctored" or "babied," I had not ventured to suggest his lying down. But he was almost a dead weight upon me when I finally got him to the bed, and with the whispered words, "No doctor," he fainted.

Fortunately I have had much experience with swoons, and in sickness and accidents of widely differing kinds, so that I was not as much alarmed as I otherwise would have been, but even with my conviction that he was only in an ordinary swoon, there seemed a light band clutching my heart until the restorative I applied were rewarded by the opening of Dicky's eyes.

"Did I go under?" he asked slowly. "What a fool!"

"Don't talk yet!" I urged. "Drink this!"

I slipped my arm under his shoulders, and put a glass to his lips. He drained it obediently, and I eased him back to his pillow, taking my first opportunity to give more than a cursory glance to the queer-looking and blood-stained bandage around his head.

But as I bent down to inspect the bandage, Dicky put up both hands over it, as if he were protecting it from me.

"Didn't you ever see a cut on the head before?" he demanded crossly. "I'm all right now, or will be in a minute or two, and I'll attend to this myself."
