

Ford Can Deadlock Election

May Carry Enough States as Third Party Candidate to Prevent Majority in Electoral College.

By Mark Sullivan.

A man well informed on political conditions in Nebraska says that in that almost exclusively agricultural part of the country there is a sympathetic feeling toward the president based on the theory that Coolidge, by his origin and association, is responsive to the farmer. He says:

"In this part of the country the early progressive movement and the Non-Partisan league had their origin largely in the discontent of the farmer. I mix very much with farmers and find that the expression 'dirt farmer' is clearly used with reference to men who run for office as a qualification thereof. If I were doing the political work of this state this year I would select some well-informed high-class, broad-minded farmer who actually drives his own team and works his own soil. That would be my slogan in the campaign for the election of my man. I am not maintaining this point as a necessary qualification for office, but simply as the qualification for a candidate for office, which is quite a different thing from qualification for office. The dirt farmer idea as applied to Coolidge became thoroughly advertised when he was found at his father's home when he became president. He was found doing all that any farmer in the agricultural west does and without any thought of using it as a political argument, which in itself makes it the best political argument."

However, the same man who speaks thus of the favor of Coolidge with the farmers goes on to say that Ford is more popular in this agricultural territory than any other one man.

"As to the presidential sentiment, it is my opinion that in Nebraska at this time, if all men who aspire to become president were put upon a ballot without any party designation, Henry Ford would poll from six to seven out of 10 votes in the agricultural and labor element. It is almost impossible to find a democrat or republican farmer who drives a Ford who is not for him, and aggressively so. In order that you may not think I am speaking from a personal bias, I might state that my own leanings at this time are for Coolidge, with Hoover and Hughes as equally available in the order named. The laboring man argues for Ford because he pays the highest wages and had no trouble with his help. The farmer argues, if it had not been for Ford the automobiles would have been too expensive for the farmer to buy, and numbers of other reasons are given.

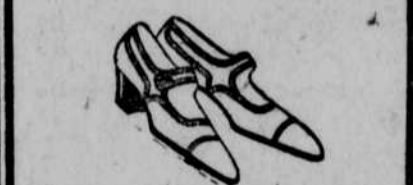

The extent of the Ford sentiment is reflected in the fact that Ashton C. Shallenberger, congressman-elect from this district, has come out openly for Henry Ford for president and has announced that he will do his utmost to procure a delegation for Henry Ford to the next national democratic convention. Mr. Shallenberger is a very keen political observer, having formerly been governor one term and also congressman. It is believed by political wisecracks that Shallenberger is trying to sound out sentiment to see if the Ford band wagon might carry him to the United States senate. I mention the Shallenberger incident as an indication of the very strong Ford sentiment in Nebraska. Mr. Shallenberger represents the congressional district formerly represented by Senator George W. Norris, which district was probably the center of progressivism when that movement was at its height.

In North Dakota a man who has the complete possible knowledge of political conditions in that state makes the following points:

"If Ford should seek the democratic nomination he would be most likely to carry the North Dakota primaries. With reference to Ford, the general feeling is that he would make a poor president, but a splendid candidate. If Ford were to seek the democratic nomination he would be most likely to carry North Dakota."

As regards the republican situation, if the Nonpartisan league remains within the republican party, La Follette is likely to carry the state. Hiram Johnson is not at this time very strong in North Dakota. There is very little Hiram Johnson talk. With Johnson and La Follette both in the race, La Follette would overwhelm Johnson. ## HEALTH IS WEALTH

Keeping the Teeth Good Makes Better Health

Many of your ills are caused by unclean, decayed or abscessed teeth. Pyorrhea, that dreaded mouth disease, is caused directly from unclean, unkept teeth. Clean, well kept teeth indicate a clean, orderly mind and a generally healthy body. Gold, porcelain, silver or amalgam fillings help to save teeth when decay has already started.

Because of system and volume, we are able to quote these very reasonable prices.
