ICHAEL O'HALLORAN

she is."

"So 'tain't!" said Mickey, starting the machine. "Well if you'l line up. I'll show you. Train your peepers down that green subway, and on out to glory as presented by the Almightly in this particular stretch of country, and just beyond your cows there you'll see a spot about as big as Bobbie, and that will be your nice lady heading straight for sunrise. She said sh'd wanted to go for 15 years, but there always had been churning, or baking, or something, so this morning, as there wasn't a thing but what I could do as good as she could, why we made it up that I'd finish her work and let her see her sunrise, since she seems to be I'd finish her work and let her see her sunrise, since she seems to be set on it; and when she gets back she's going to wash and dress Lily for a change. Strange how women folks get discouraged on their job, among their best friends, who would do anything in the world for them, 'cept just to see that a little bit of change would help them. It will be a dandy scheme for Lily, 'cause it lets her get her sleep out, and it will be good for you, 'cause if Mrs. Harding doesn't get to sit under that apple tree and watch sunup pretty soon, things are going to go wrong at soon, things are going to go wrong at this house."

this house."

Peter's jaw slowly sagged.

"If you don't hurry," said Mickey,
"even loving her like you do, and loving you as she does, she's going to have them nervous prostrations like the swell dames in Multiopolis get when they ask a fellow to carry a package, and can't remember where they want to send it. She's not there yet. She's ahead of them now, for she wants to sit under that apple tree and watch sunup; but if she hadn't got there this morning or soon n't got there this morning or soon now, she'd a-begun to get mixed, I could see that plain as the city hall." "Mickey, what else can you see?" asked Peter. Enough to make your head swim,' said Mickey.

"Out with it!" ordered Peter. "Well," said Mickey gravely, and seemingly intent on the separator, but covertly watching Peter, "well, if you'd a cut that window she's wanted for fifteen years, right over her table there where the line comes, she could a been seeing that particular bit of glory—you notice Peter, that probably there's nothing niftler on earth than just the little spot she's been pining for; look good yourself, and you'll see, there she's climbing the hill to the apple tree—look at it carefully, and then step inside and focus on what else she's faced instead."

"What else does she want?" in-What else does she want?" inquired Peter.

"She didn't mention anything but to watch sunup, just once, under that apple tree," said Mickey. "I don't know what she wants; but from one day here, I could tell you things she should have." "Well go ahead and tell," said Pe-

Will you agree not to break my k 'til I get this cream in the can, I what she keeps strained, and se buckets washed?" asked Mickey. "I want to have her job all done when she gets back, 'cause I prom-sed her, and that's quite a hike she's taking."

"Welf I was 'riled' for a minute,
but I might as well hold myself," said Peter. "Looks like you were

"Strangers coming in can always see things that folks on the job can't," consoled Mickey.

"Well go on and tell me what you've seen here, Mickey!" Mickey hoisted the fourth bucket. "Well, I've seen the very nicest lady I ever saw, excepting my mother," said Mickey. "I've seen a man bout your size, that I like betman bout your size, that I like better than any man I know, barring Mr. Douglas Bruce, and the bar is such a little one it would take a microscope to find it." Peter laughed, which was what Mickey hoped he would do, for he drew a deep breath and went on with great-er assurance: "I've seen a place that I thought was a new edition of heaven, and it is, only it needs a few modern improvements—"
"Yes, Mickey! The window, and

"You haven't looked at what I told you to about the window yet," said Mickey.
"Well, since you insist on it. I will." said Peter.

"And while you are in there," suggested Mickey, "after you finish with that strip of brown oilcloth and the pans and skillets adorning it, cotton pans and skillets adorning it, cotton up to that cook stove, and imagine standing over it while it is roaring, to get three meals a day, and all the baking, fruit canning, boiling clothes, and such, and tell me if Lily's bed was in so much hotter a place than your wife is, all but about three hours each day."

Mickey listened as intently as he could for the separator he dared not stop, heard not a sound for what seemed a long time, and then came amazing ones. He grinned sympathetically as Peter emerged red-faced and raging.

"And you're about the finest man I ever met, too," commented Mickey, still busy with the cream. "You can see what a comfort this separator alce lady has got, against so many for your work it takes quite a large buildsour work it takes quite a large building to keep them in. Junior was showing me last night and telling me what all those machines were made for. You know, Peter, if there was money for a hay rake, and a manure spreader, and a wheel plow, and a lisk, and a reaper, and a mower, and a corn planter, and a corn cutter, and women coming and going, and abusta dadopts a little lame girl. Lilly Hs life at once becomes a strugging little to the life Peter, there should have been enough for that window, and the pump infor that window, and the pump in-side, and a kitchen sink, and a bread mixer, and a dish washer; and if there wasn't any other single thing, there ought to be some way you sell the wood, and use the money for the kind of a summer stove that's only hot finder what you are cooking, and turns off the flame the minute you finish. Honest there had Peter! I got a little gasoline one in my room got a little gasoline one in my room that's better than what your nice lady has. The things she should have would cost something, cost a lot for all I know, but I bet what she needs wouldn't take half the things in the building Junior showed me did; and it couldn't be the start of what a sick wife, and doctor bills, and strange do! Now you listen to me, young man. Since you are so expert at seeing things, and since you've traded work with my wife, to rest her by changing her job, suppose you just keep your eyes open, and make out a list of what she should have to do not you and the children would out work on the work convenient and easy as can be, and of course, comfortably. That will benefit Ma. Since you are so expert at seeing things, and since you've traded work with my wife, to rest her by changing her job, suppose you just keep your eyes open, and make out a list of what she should have to do not see them, and—"Seen to see them, and—""Yes, it's our secret: answered Peter gravely.

"And so could I?" asked Peter. "Is that the ticket?"
"Yes, 'said Mickey.
"Yes,' said Mickey.
