Fickle Heart of Youth Troublesome

Former Sweetheart Puzzled—Anxious to Win Him Back—Want to Lose Him—Chase Him.

By MARTHA ALLEN.

IF A young high school boy drops a girl for any little excuse, why should she clamor for his attention? There will be many changes of heart before they both reach the 30s. The shift of attention to another girl is nothing to worry about if he is still friendly toward her. He talks to the former sweetheart but doesn't ask her to go any place. That is proof enough that he is not provoked about anything but has just sought a change of scenery. The young person in question who thinks she should feel hurt by this boy's indifference should remain "Just a Pal" as she signs her letter. He will admire her much more if she has attention from other beaux. The easiest way to lose the respect of others, no matter what age, is to chase after them when they are not particularly interested in you. Your own pride ought to forbid such action.

Jane: At the theater if the usher takes the checks at the head of the aisle the woman follows the usher and the man after.

Reader: In very large cities, neighbors seldom call on each other. If strangers move into a small town or country place it is only courteous for their neighbors to call. Older residents always call on the newer.

Ruth: Invitations to a wedding are mailed about three weeks before the wedding. Presents to the bride are sent as soon as the invitations are out.

H: In dating a letter the date is put at the upper right hand of the first page or at the end and to the left of the signature.

Opal: When a young man calls upon a girl at her home it is his duty to thank her for an enjoyable evening. She need only tell him that she enjoyed having him call and ask him to call again.

Kluth of the Pearl Memorial Methodist church. The relatives of the young couple were their only guests. Harry A. Haney, a brother of the groom, was his best man, and his sister, Mrs. Earl J. Perry, of

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

Lillian Showed What She Thought of Harriet.

In the early days of my marriage my stately sister-in-law, Harriet Braithwaite, was an object of awe to me, and I never would have dreamed of speaking to her in the peremptory fashion I just had employed, even though my object in so doing was to banish her foolish, morbid fancies. But her appeal to me and her gratitude for the counsel I had been able to give her, and which she appeared to value far too highly had drawn us closely together. I knew that she felt as I did, that we now had the spirit of sisterhood as well as the name, and it was with the affectionate if rough phraseology that I would have used toward my own sister if I had possessed one that I addressed her.

I suspect that her dignity was a trifle ruffled at my ultimatum that she come with her husband and me to Mrs. Durkee's home in Marvin, disregarding the fact that Katherine Bickett was there, but if it were she admiringly concealed her annoyance. "Thank you so much, Margaret," she said earnestly. "You have no idea how great my relief is to hear you say that. And I am so glad that you are going down with us. I hadn't hoped for that."

"It really is rather superfluous for me to go," I said, adjusting my hat. "Little Mrs. Durkee certainly is well cared for, with her son, daughter-in-law, and nurse, but she made me promise that I would come to her when an operation finally was decided on, so I'm going."

A Compliment for Madge.

"I can readily see why she wants you, Margaret," my sister-in-law said, and there was such sincerity in the compliment that I was gratified indeed, though so embarrassed that I welcomed Lillian's peremptory summons from the other side of the door.

"Madge! You have six minutes for your breakfast. It's all ready."

"I need but four," I rejoined, laughingly, as, with a word of apology to Harriet, I opened the door and came into the living room. My sister-in-law picked up my overnight bag, my purse and my coat and followed me.

"Is there anything else you want?" she asked efficiently. "If not, I'll just take charge of these until you get through your breakfast. Then you'll have them ready to hand."

I knew by the glint in Lillian's eyes that something had amused her, but it was not until we were safely in the kitchen and she was serving me my breakfast that a comment burst from her lips as if she could repress it no longer.

A Suggested Vocation.

"That sister-in-law of yours ought to get a job as a Pullman porter," she said. "She does everything but breathe for her husband, and now she's started on you."

"Perhaps she'll take you on," I said, with a sly glance at her, for Lillian, despite the almost unending smoothness with which any undertaking of hers runs, is noted among her intimates for the carelessness with which she strews her personal belongings in all quarters.

"No, thank you. I'll try to struggle along," she retorted dryly, and I realized what I had suspected before, that Lillian held for my sister-in-law one of her curious unreasoning antipathies. It was nothing that would ever cause any unpleasantness—Lillian is too good an actress to betray her feelings where it would embarrass any one—and I knew that she would be the first to acknowledge that she had no foundation, no reason for her aversion. It was distinctly a case of—

do not like thee, Dr. Fell. The reason why I cannot tell, but this I know and know full well, I do not like thee, Dr. Fell."

I hummed the words provokingly, when, at the end of the four minutes I had named I rose from my chair, my breakfast finished.

"Exactly," she said. "I know I'm a hard-shell crab, but I can't stand those superlatively efficient women."

Harriet Braithwaite's crisp call, "The taxi's here," punctuated her sentence, but as I hurried back to the living room I could not repress the mentally smiling reflection that many people put Lillian herself into the same characterization which she had employed regarding my sister-in-law.
