D. A. R. Will Mark Oregon Trail

Platte County Chapter Will Sell Cedar Chest to Raise Funds.

Columbus, Neb., Nov. 14.—Through the sale of a cedar chest which they have filled with all kinds of fine linens for use in the home, the members of the Platte county chapter of the D. A. R. expect to realize a substantial sum toward the fund they are creating for the erection of a granite marker for the old Oregon trail here.

More than two years ago the members began the accumulation of the fund. Through a series of card parties they made a good start, netting $200. Last May they began preparation of the contents of the cedar chest until now the collection is valued at $150. The chest costs an additional $40. The chapter has designated February 22, Washington's birthday, as the day on which the chest is to be offered for sale. The Oregon trail monument is to cost $1,500.

Anglo-Indian Visitor at Willard Hall

Dr. Matilda Hunt, an Anglo-Indian (Eurasian), is in Omaha giving lectures. She is a guest at Willard Hall, a home for business women recently opened under Methodist auspices.

Dr. Hunt was the first woman in India to be given the degree of Master of Arts. This she received in 1893 from the Sind Arts college at Karachi. Subsequently she was the first of two women in India to be given the degree of Bachelor of Science. She worked in India as an editor of a paper and as the head mistress of a school for upper class Parsi and Mohammedan girls. Then she went to London to study further, earning the degree of Doctor of Medicine and Bachelor of Surgery and also a diploma for public health service from the Universities of London and Cambridge.

Dr. Matilda Hunt

She was placed in charge of the first infant welfare center in Great Britain, which position she filled for 10 years. She also served as lecturer to the London county council for an equal number of years.

"During all this time," Dr. Hunt said, "my heart yearned over the deplorable condition of 30,000 or more submerged children of British descent in India who are to be found in the very lowest stratum of life in the great cities of Calcutta, Bombay, Madras and Bangalore."

Dr. Hunt is working under a plan whereby these children may be placed in the existing schools and orphanages of India and given a general education, later being fitted in existing institutions for industrial positions. Her plan includes in its scope the creation of small colonies on the hills of India like the Eastern Ghats.

where these trained men and women will live in little towns which will be the center for industrial activities. Her program, also provides for securing a corps of leaders.

So interested have the young women of Willard Hall become that they have undertaken the support of one child of British parentage for one year in these schools at an outlay of $100.

Dr. Hunt speaks on health topics. She will be in Omaha for several weeks.

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

Katherine Took Charge of Mrs. Durkee.

Katherine not only has the knowledge, deftness and resourcefulness which her training as a nurse has given her, but she possesses a delicate and sure intuition, and an initiative which enables her to handle any situation.

Whether or not she had met Lella in the hall and been told of her patient's hysteria I could not tell—her keen, practiced eyes were guide enough to the problem, and her words were as casual as if Mrs. Durkee and I were calmly seated at afternoon tea.

"Lo, Madge, I was afraid I'd miss your coming. But I had to go to Freeport for some things we needed and which were not delivered when they were promised, and you know what a burg that is to get back from by train."

"Indeed, I do." I returned with a reminiscent little laugh. Katherine had laid down her parcels, and removed her hat as she spoke, and she now advanced to us, and put her arm around her trembling patient.

"Time for your nap, little lady," she said with her best professional manner.

Mrs. Durkee looked up at her with a tremulous little smile, in which, however, I detected a touch of the delicate diablerie which is the little woman's chief charm.

"Madge says I don't have to see Dr. Braithwaite or have him operate if I don't want to," she announced a bit defiantly.

"Madge is a wise girl," Katherine returned with an emphasis which I understood, while the approval of my actions which it implied gratified me exceedingly. She was turning down the bed as she spoke, and she patted the pillows invitingly.

"Just lie down and I'll take off your shoes," she said.

"Her Fluffiness" cast a protesting look at her beautiful negligee gown.

Soothing the Patient.

"But this will get all rumpled," she said. "I shan't be fit to be seen. It's had enough to have to appear in a negligee, anyway."

Over her head Katherine and I flashed a glance of amused understanding. She already was subconsciously anticipating a meeting with the surgeon whom she hysterically had declared five minutes before she would not see.

"That's true," Katherine said. "With Lella dripping quarts of tears all over the room," Katherine interposed. "I thought so. I never should have left them together. But it's all the other, and tucked our little friend in bed.

"Now this," she said, handing Mrs. Durkee a tiny pellet and a glass of water, "and you'll be asleep before you know it."

The little woman docilely cuddled down among her pillows and closed her eyes, but opened them almost immediately to say imperatively:

"Girls, don't let the dinner spoil. That Mrs. Braithwaite is a model housekeeper."

She closed her eyes again, and Katherine motioned me to the door, through which we passed leaving it but a trifle ajar. There we stood, tense, listening, until the sound of deep, regular breathing told us that Katherine's prescription had taken effect. Lella, red-eyed and tremulous, had joined us, but Katherine's gesture of silence had kept her as quiet and watchful as ourselves.

My little kinswoman noiselessly stepped back into the room, and came out again almost instantly, closing the door tightly shut behind her with such infinite care that not even the faintest creak betrayed the action. Then she beckoned us down the hall to her own room.

"Now," she said, "one of us must sit outside until she awakens."

"Please let me," Lella pleaded.

Mrs. Durkee Sleeps.

"Surely," Katherine assented, "only you must promise me one thing: When she awakens and calls, do not answer her yourself, but call me instantly. I want to see her before anyone else does."

There was an authority in her voice which was not to be disregarded, and Lella promptly gave the required promise.

"That's that," Katherine said, when after Lella had left us and taken up her veil, my little kinswoman closed her door and faced me. "Tell me what happened."

I told her as briefly as possible of Mrs. Durkee's brainstorm and hysterical protests that she would not see Dr. Braithwaite.

"With Lella dripping quarts of tears all over the room," Katherine interposed. "I thought so. I never should have left them together. But it's all right now. She'll wake up all right after that sedative."

"There was a humorous quirk of her lips as she pronounced the word which made me glance at her quickly."

"What did you give her?" I asked with unparadonable curiosity.

"A sugared bread pill," she answered. "You don't suppose I'd hand out anything else with a surgeon waiting to inspect her condition, do you? Her imagination did the rest?"

Wicked Sirens Win Attention

Infatuation for New Champions of Town Breaks Up Romance of Two Brothers and Two Chums—Trouble.

By MARTHA ALLEN.

TWO girl chums think they have real heartaches just because two young men, brothers, have transferred their attention from them to two new women in town.

You are not engaged to them, B. and S., but still you think of telling them all about these new women who are said to have had characters. It's the nature of some men constantly to seek new fields to conquer so you'll have to be content to be on the sidelines instead of taking part in the game. Since neither of you is engaged to either of these men, there is no need to consider a change of heart to be trouble. Wait until you have good cause before you cry for help. Even if you have proof that these new sirens have a "shady" past it wouldn't be advisable to let the young men hear you say so. If you want to hold their friendship keep silent about other girls and their characters. Men hate women who show a jealous disposition by maligning other women.
