cousin, the aviator, appeared Danny and Nanny scampered away and hid in the grass. But they were back again just as soon as the way was clear. There were some days that they had no visitors at all. They didn't even go home to their old home in the old scarecrow. When at last they had the snuggest of snug nests in that tiny cupboard and there was nothing more to do to it Nanny hoped more than ever that the man-bird always would remain right where it was. By this time she had quite made up her nund that it would. She seldem went back to the old home in the old scarecrow. She spent more and more time in this new home. The fact is, she had begun to think of this now as a real home, the home in which they would continue to live. And this is what had come from yielding to temptation. (Copyright, 1923.)
