Can a Woman Love Two Men at Same Time?

By MARTHA ALLEN.

Can a woman love two men at the same time? Lucille asks this question, which is very difficult to answer. "I have gone with a man for a number of years whom I always thought I loved. Recently I met another man and find that I am rapidly falling in love with him. But my love for the first man has not decreased, so what shall I do?" writes this young lady of 25 years.

This is a twist of affairs that is not uncommon. Girls in such entanglements of the heart strings are either in love with love itself, infatuated with one or both of the men, or partly satisfied with the attention from each.

Real love is something that demands full rights and seldom has rivals in tow. There ought to be a sense of completion, a feeling that the right man has been found when the good times they can give her, a girl is consumed with indecision only when her whole heart is not involved in the affair. If she loved one man she wouldn't want to see any one else. There would not be any need for the questions in this letter.

When a girl finds herself asking these questions it is easy to guess that she loves neither man. Such a girl may enjoy one or both but may be able to give her in admiration, attention, and thrills from love making. She probably enjoys their friendship, the good times they can give her, and the pleasure of the conquest. She is probably giving herself a gay time playing the world-old game of coquette.

Love goes too deep for doubling so the feelings that Lucille has for both these men is just surface emotion, just infatuation. The real emotion seldom doubts and never wavers. It is always very positive. In fact, so positive that there will be no need for anyone giving advice or assistance in the choice of the right man.

Dangerous Man.
Dear Miss Allen: I am 20 years old and married. I have been married for five years. My husband is 27 and is very good to me. He takes me out for a good time on Sunday and buys me clothes when I need them. But the thing is that he is going out with a man I just hate. Every time my husband goes out with this man I feel blue and get mad, too. I don't speak to my husband for the whole day. He says that I do not stop going mad that he will do something that I will be sorry for. This man drinks and I think he takes my husband where there are flappers. Still my husband says that he loves me very much. He tells me that he wouldn't go out with any other girls and I believe him. I hate to have such a feeling, but oh how I hate this man. This man has not done anything to me, but I think he will spoil my husband.

A FRIEND.
Hatred for any one is dangerous, but especially in your case if it is going to separate you and your husband. This friend of your husband may be just as bad as you think, but I would leave that for your husband to find out. If he is constant in his love for you and treats you accordingly you shouldn't complain. In time he will tire of this man if he is worthless or wake up to his shortcomings with a jolt. Be patient and by all means don't get a "mad" on. Cultivate a large enough nature to surrender to unpleasant things that come to you. No use nursing a grievance that will be a joy killer in your home when it really hasn't a great deal to do with you. It is hard to see your husband led into the wrong paths, but are making matters worse by being peevish. Try to keep cheerful and he will find home a more pleasant place than any other place to which this man might take him.

my point that I unconsciously had embroidered my conversational fabric. My own observations, supplemented by Lillian's and bolstered by things Dicky and his mother had said concerning Harriet's sheltering of the eminent surgeon from all annoyance, had been responsible for my strictures. But of my own knowledge I did not know that he was known as "the man who can't get along with out his wife at every step," and I was abashed at her anger, although I did not let her guess my feeling.

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

Madge Made Plain Course Harriet Should Adopt.
I was not prepared for Harriet's furious and suspicious query as to the source of my comment upon her too assiduous care of her brilliant husband. Like many other people, I had been so absorbed in making

"That I cannot tell you," I said gravely, with the mental comment that at least I was speaking the truth now, "but you may be very sure of one thing. I did not hear it from Katherine. Forgive me, Harriet, if I have been too abrupt. I wanted only to help you."
I think she heard nothing at first but my assurance concerning Katherine. The anger died from her face, and she sank into her chair, her eyes fixed upon the flickering flames in the grate. As for me, I sat tense, silent, not daring to speak, wondering if I had destroyed my chance of helping her.
When she looked up at me at last, every vestige of fury had died from her eyes.

"You—have—helped me," she said dully. "It is only what I have glimpsed myself many times. But I always have pushed the thought away, because Edwin seemed to need me so. He really did. Margaret—her face was abjectly pitiful as she looked up at me—he seemed lost without me."
How I longed at that minute to put into her arms a child, near enough in kinship to have a right to her love, yet sorrowful, neglected, needing swift and unremitting care and lavish affection. I saw clearly enough that it was the thwarted maternal instinct of the woman who through a mistaken ideal had sacrificed motherhood to her husband's career which had led her to such unnecessary shielding of her husband from all contact with the rough edges of life. Children in her home—but that was impossible, and as the vision of them from my chair, and taking her hands, pulled her to her feet, facing me.
"Look here, Harriet," I said roughly, "you are jumping from a hot but tenable frying-pan into a fire which will shroud you in an instant. Edwin does need you, always has, always will. Don't run away with the idea that your course has been absolutely wrong. It's only that there has been too much of it. There is no doubt that you have helped him materially, and he is lost without you. What I am telling you is only that you should accustom him gradually to rely more upon himself for the little details of life. Don't take it so seriously. Go down to the farm and put Edwin and everybody else save yourself out of your mind for awhile. Your mother won't give you time to think of Edwin or your duties, she will be so busy talking and I will make you a present of Junior while you are there. Can I offer you more?"

A PSYCHOLOGY TEST
Draw on Your Psychic Powers to Make $500
I have deposited $500 with my attorneys, Beveridge & Spittler, City Nat'l Bank Bldg., which is ordered payable to the first person who can successfully solve this puzzle in three days, starting December 12, ending December 15, 1923. A successful solution submitted later than 3 days from this date will not be considered. The puzzle is worth a large sum of money to advertisers. In case of a tie, each tieing contestant receives the same.
The plan drawn represents the foundation of a five-room house, every wall of every room therein having a door, making sixteen doors in all.
To solve the puzzle you must rewrite the plan and with a pencil or pen, draw a line showing passage through each room, and every door by using each door one time only. It makes no difference at what point you start, inside or outside the lines. You can retrace your track and enter any room as many times as necessary, but you can only pass through each door one time. Each number represents a door. A picture of the first person who solves this puzzle will be published in each Omaha paper.

Send your solution to D. Marino, 1112 South 13th Street, Omaha, Neb.
