Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love."

Lillian and Midge Compared Notes. Lillian rose, and clasping both hands over her heart, made a sweeping bow to my mother-in-law. It was meant as burlesque, and intended to draw a smile from the saddened elder woman, but I knew that in it there was the essence of a sincere and reverential salute.

consideration of Harriet. For the few days they are here I'm going to have Mary and little Roderick in my room—that extension daybed is very comfortable—and the two other boys I'm going to put into the sewing room, which, as you know, has a door opening into mine. The room is all ready except for the bed, and Jim can move that other extension daybed from down the hall into it. Then I shall have the children right with me, and, for all Harriet knows, I shall expect to keep them always. If you'll go down and have Jim come up—as soon as he's finished with those chickens, I mean.

Things to Plan. I bit back a smile. It was unlike my mother-in-law to consider the convenience of either Jim or Katie when she wished any task performed, but I knew that not for worlds would she present her daughter's eyes the picture of anything save a smoothly running domestic machine. And she meant to take no chance of throwing a non-key wrench into the machinery by upsetting temperamental Katie's equilibrium.

"Are you sure you'll be all right while I'm gone, mother?" I asked solicitously, for her fine old face looked pitifully wan against the cushions of her high-backed chair.

"Of course," she said, a bit irritably. "I don't want either one of you around. I've got a lot of things to plan out and mull over, and I'm very comfortable here by the fire."

I walked reluctantly to the door, and paused hesitatingly with my hand on the doorknob. She flashed an inquiring, impatient glance at me, and then her eyes softened, although her voice was as irascible as ever.

"Don't worry. I'm not going to go out of this room while you're gone," she said. "I have no desire to get chilled, and I have a little sense left, which is more than I can say for some people."

I hesitated no longer, but made a hasty exit, and before I reached the kitchen Lillian had joined me.

"Some dame!" that mother-in-law of yours," she commented. "She has a campaign planned that Grant couldn't have sneezed at, and I'll back her on the 'all summer' limit, too, if she thinks her daughter needs the opposition."

The Mother Who Failed. "Don't you think she's overdoing it a little?" I asked dubiously.

"No, I don't," she retorted promptly. "She's wise enough to know that it's a mighty serious proposition taking four children into a childless home, no matter how great the need of children has been. Of course Dr. Braithwaite will be wild to have them—all he will see will be the chance for the fatherhood which has been denied him, and for which he is starved."

"Don't you think Harriet is also longing for the children she denied herself because of her mistaken idea of the supreme importance of her husband's career?"

"Undoubtedly, but—you must remember that all of the care and the discipline of four children—whose mother—pardon me—"

"You need not ask it," I said steadily. "Justice is justice, even when the dead are concerned, and you know as well as I do now she failed in real motherhood."

"Yes," mused Lillian, "and yet I warrant you that to everyone save her closest intimates she is being held up today as an example of a perfect mother. Ugh! When I think of that child's face when she started to lead her down that path that summer—"

I can't be sorry she's gone. But that's beside the question. Mrs. Braithwaite will have the discipline of four spoiled children, and if you ask my private opinion, she'll very soon tire of her job, unless she has some powerful incentive to keep on with it, such as the idea that everyone was against her having them. Her obstinacy would see her through in that case."

"There was an odd little note in Lillian's voice which puzzled me, until I remembered her unreasoning dislike of Harriet Braithwaite, and realized that she had no faith in my sister-in-law's desire to mother her orphaned niece and nephews.

Founders' Day Luncheon of P. E. O. Chapters. The sisterhood of P. E. O. will meet for luncheon on founders' day, Thursday of next week, at 12:30. They will lunch in the Y. W. C. A. and many out-of-town chapter members are expected to attend. The Council Bluffs and Glenwood (Ia.) chapters will come in a body. Mrs. Ona Baird of Plattsmouth, past state president, and Miss Lulu Wolford of Lincoln, the present president, will be among the guests.

Mrs. D. R. Gilbert of Warren, O., is the guest of Mrs. F. E. Pearce.
