Market News. Weather and crop conditions in Kansas for week ending January 22: Wheat has changed but little. The snow served to protect it from severely cold weether in most sections and it is not believed to have suffered material damage this week, though it is too soon to ascertain this fact definitely. The crop is dormant and in many parts frozen to the ground or brown, hence is furnishing very little pasture at the present time with the possible exception of late sown wheat, the crop seems to have retained its vitality.	Influential commission house buying of May oats developed a tight condition in this pit. Cash news augumented the support in this grain. Reports from lowa and that oats were moving to western markets like corn, because of the higher prices that preval there when freight rates are considered. Rye entoyed a fairly sharm advence.

Boston: New England corn situation. Boston: New England finds a temporary scarcity of corn on hand on account of January contracts not being shipped until the last minute. This may cause surplus after February 1. Oats very quiet. Broomhall says: Light showers are falling and these are beneficial for the growing crop of corn, especially the late sown. Shipments this week of all new crops are expected to be heavy; wheat will probably increase 700,000 and oats 400,000. The movement is in full swing and cutting is extending throughout the southern region. The country is pressing sales at current prices and the future market is 3c a bushel lower than a formight ago.
