Just as I got into the the blind which met me half way when I started towards it, a flock of purple-headed Teal swung over me. I raised up my double barrel and fired, shooting five times, and got a double with each shot. The geese in the river hearing the noise started wading towards me so I started to call them. While calling, a flock of chicken bobbled past and I gave them a right and left, shooting the heads off the first seven birds. I let them drift to me and then again crouched down in the blind. The geese seemed to be acting queerly and I noticed that one broken his stilts and was making use of a piece of drift wood using it like a man would a crutch. While watching them I failed to notice that a flock of ducks had decoyed and only heard them when they pecked on the bard sides of my decoys. I gave them five shots and noticed when I picked them up that they were a cross between Mallards and Red Heads. The combination, incidentally, makes a very beautiful and striking looking bird. The markings on the underside were particularly unusual.
