and went over to the airplane. He counted the little bolts that had been left there. Two were missing. If ever there was surprised person in all the Great World it was that aviator. There wasn't a doubt in his mind now that he had seen the thief. What under the sun any animal could want of serews and bolts he couldn't imagine. But with his own eyes he had seen two bolts carried away, and he didn't doubt that these had gone to join all the other things that had disappeared. He went over to the other watcher and told him what he had seen. Then together they watched to see if the thief would come back. He did in a very short time. Both saw him this time. When he had disappeared with a third little bolt, they went over to the airplane and gathered up the rest. Then they went back to the house to tell the others what they had discovered.

"He wasn't bigger than a Rat," de clared the aviator as he told the story. "No, sir, he wasn't bigger than a Rat. In fact, he looked to me very much like a rat. But what under the sun would a rat want of screws and nuts and bolts? It is too much for

The man who owned the house began to laugh. "The thief, suh," said he, "is a tat. He is not a thief, but a collector. He is Trader the Wood Rat. Yes, suh, he is Trader the Wood Rat. Ah reckons Ah ought to have thought of him befo', but the truth is he never entered man head. Tomorrow we'll hunt to' his nest, and Ar reckons we'll find everything that has been lost. Yes, suh, Ah reckons we will. Ah ought to have thought of Trader befo'. That scamp is probably as tickled with those things as a pickaninny with a lot of new toys." He was right. Trader spent all the rest of that night playing with and gloating over his new treasures There was no happier small person in
