

Pure Bred Dairy Herds Installed in Holt County

Stockmen Co-Operate in Campaign to Make Nebraska Dairy State—Tests Show Benefits.

O'Neill, Neb., March 6.—Tangible results in the campaign to add 1,000,000 head of cows to the dairy herds of Nebraska already are manifesting themselves in Holt county and around O'Neill.

A number of head of registered purebred Holstein milk cattle already have been imported and others are on the way. Among the first to replace his ordinary milk cows with the aristocracy of dairymen near O'Neill was Frank Lancaster, prominent stockman and former county agent, who has disposed of all but three head of his former milk cattle and replaced them with 17 head of registered and tested Holsteins from a noted Minnesota herd.

Mr. Lancaster finds that while some of the milk from the Holsteins does not test as high in butterfat as does the milk of the three crack red cows which he saved with which to make the test, in every instance the larger quantity of milk produced by the Holstein also results in the yield of a larger amount of butterfat per animal and a larger yield of separated milk per animal to be fed to his large herd of young pigs.

Several exclusive dairymen, since noting the result of the test on the Lancaster herd, have announced their intention of replacing in entirety their present dairy herds and a number of others will milk from eight to ten head each as daily revenue producers.

Washington Considers McLean Merely as a "Dub," Says Sullivan

Publisher Will Show Himself in His True Light When He Appears Before Senate Investigating Committee Is General Opinion—Third Variation of Check Story Expected at Hearing.

By MARK SULLIVAN

Washington, March 6.—This week the public will learn who Edward McLean is.

McLean would not like to be called a "dub" or "boob" any more than the rest of us would. Yet, McLean ought to be grateful to anyone who explains his present predicament on the ground that he is a "dub," rather than the only alternative ground, which is something very sinister indeed. For that matter, McLean himself will have to choose of these two explanations when he stands up this week before Senator Thomas Walsh.

McLean will have to reveal himself either as a fulfillment of the phrase "poor boob" or else as a sinister conspirator. The only third way out for McLean will be to refuse to testify, on the same ground that Fall refused, namely because it would tend to incriminate him; and of all three possible courses, that would be the most damaging to McLean.

Most of us who have been around Washington the longer and think we know the most about it accept the first alternative, that McLean has played the part of a "dub."

It may seem extraordinary to describe the owner of the Washington Post and the Cincinnati Inquirer as a "dub" of such degree of "dubship" as his present predicament implies, but it must be remembered that McLean acquired these two newspapers as an inheritance from his father. Most persons in the newspaper business are of the opinion if young McLean hadn't inherited them he would not have them. Not only these two papers, but also a great deal of other wealth in miscellaneous forms, came to McLean from the late John R. McLean. A good deal might be said about McLean, sr., if there were not so much necessary to be said just now about McLean, jr. McLean, sr., was of a type more familiar 25 years ago than now. He owned, in addition to his two newspapers, most of the gas company, most of the street railway company, most of the leading trust company and most of the leading bank.

Was Forceful Character. Some rather strong things were said about him, but he was a strong person with plenty of ability and with character of the sort that forceful men or rough men understand. When he came to die he left his property to his only child—not directly, but in the custody of a trust company, and carefully surrounded with conditions which suggested that he may have thought he had reasons to apprehend that his heir might turn out to be less competent in guarding against the dissipation of the fortune than he himself was. Young McLean went to the courts to break the will, and it ended in a compromise by which he was permitted to be a co-trustee and permitted to have charge of the two newspapers under the helpful and scrutinizing eyes of a considerable retinue of lawyers, bankers, business managers, confidential personal employees and the like.

Young McLean, as an only son, seems to have suffered more than usually from the handicaps that sometimes attend the upbringing of a rich man's only child. The fact that he, though the son of one of the richest men in Washington, never went to college would seem to argue something somewhat unusual about his upbringing and mental discipline.

More Filings for Public Offices

Cornelius N. Rice, 1904 Locust street, republican, filed today in the office of the election commissioner as a candidate for nomination as state representative from the Eighth district.

Other filings were those of L. R. Newkirk, 6905 Western avenue, republican, state representative, 13th district; Herbert H. Boyles, 710 North Twenty-seventh avenue, republican, state representative, 10th district; Henry H. Lovell, 3515 Dewey avenue, democrat, state senator, Fifth district; Chris Kelle, republican, road overseer, Ninth district; Tom Falconer, 3702 North Twenty-first street, republican, county commissioner; J. D. Wear, 3424 Dodge street, director Metropolitan Utilities district; John L. Yeager, Valley, Neb., republican, justice of the peace; H. Mayweather, Valley, democrat, road overseer; George Ott, Benson, republican, county commissioner, Third district; John Williams, Florence, republican, road overseer; Thomas Vacek, 2634 North Sixty-eighth street, republican, state representative, 20th district; and Cornelius McGreevy, 2225 Mishni street, republican, state representative, Ninth district.

It was out of the association with Harding and Harding's friends that McLean's present troubles arose. Fall and Daugherty were close to the president, and McLean was close to all three. When Daugherty came to Washington he made his home for several months in McLean's house. That fact, no doubt will be made to have some weight in the coming investigation of Daugherty.

Mad Lived Youth. In his youth, according to the stories about town, he accumulated a considerable acquaintance with the sort of persons who hang around race tracks and other persons identified with forms of amusement sometimes associated with race tracks. After his father died, however, and after he was permitted to participate in the management of the properties, a good many folks in Washington took the ground that whatever had been said about McLean as a younger man ought now to be forgotten; and it is a fact that there was some evidence of an effort on his part to live up to the sort of responsibilities that should go with ownership of important papers in two cities.

Washington began to think of the young man as being, if not an ideal custodian of those community interests that should attach to a newspaper, nevertheless, one who under his new associations and responsibilities, seemed to be trying to do his best and steadily improving. But unhappily criticism loves a shining mark; and McLean became a shining mark when President Harding, after his election, immediately on coming to Washington identified himself with McLean's house, and identified McLean with the White House in ways so conspicuous that
