York County Clubs Report Community Service

York, Neb.—Evidence of the service of the small town women's club to the community and state was displayed by the federated clubs of York county in convention at Gresham this week.

Ninety women present at the convention set forth the ambitious study programs carried on by every club, not only in art, music and literature, but also in civic and welfare problems. Study of the national constitution, immigration problems and the bonus bill were among the subject reported. The greatest enthusiasm of the delegates was reserved for community service.

All the clubs reported donations to the Nebraska Children's Home society building. In townships where there is no woman's club, no such donations were made.

The York club displayed the principal activity. It has in the last year twice brought Cho Cho, the health clown, to interest the children and parents in health habits; it has a visiting committee to co-operate with the state custodial home maintenance club, both at the county fair; has a woman's exchange, and sponsors the business girls' club.

Trees for the grounds of the new consolidated school will be purchased by the Benedict woman's club. Flower bulbs in the school grounds are the gift of the Lushton club, which is now turning its attention to home economics and girls' activities. The Gresham club is bending its energies to the establishment of a public library, for which it now has 900 volumes, and is beautifying the park near the railroad station. The McCool club sponsors a lecture course and the Bradshaw club has contributed to the Harding memorial.

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

Madge Told Alfred Dicky Would Corroborate Her Word.

I did not need to look at Alfred Dicky to know that I had drawn blood when, in answer to his protest against my comment upon Bess Dean, I had told him that I was perfectly sure she was not in love with him. His sudden flat silence told me that I had pricked through the skin of his vanity, and I did not need the embarrassed but insincere denial which followed to reinforce my recognition.

"Of course she isn't," he said roughly. "I know that, but the rest of you act that way. You're getting a wrong slant on this," he went on, and this time there was a ring of sincerity in his voice. "I did play around with Bess a bit—and so did the Dicky-bird—I wouldn't say that, only he told me you knew it"—this inserted half defiantly, half apologetically.

"I know all about it," I interpolated, to keep the amusement from my voice—Alfred was boyishly transparent in his mental foundering. "Then you know, too, that there wasn't any harm in it," he retorted quickly. "Lella wouldn't have objected if I'd taken you, for instance, around as much as I did Bess."

"Wouldn't she?" I asked myself ironically with a mental grin at the blindness of Alfred's type of masculinity, but aloud I only murmured demurely:

"Not Sauce for the Goose."

"Of course not, any more than you would object to Lella's running around with Dicky to the same extent."

I glanced from under my half-closed eyelashes at him, and chuckled at the queer expression which flashed into his face at the thrust. Sauce for the gander was distinctly not sauce for the goose in this particular case. I saw clearly, and with a mental calculation that the subway journey remaining was just about long enough for the things I meant to say, I turned to him resolutely.

"It's not particularly clubby to say what I'm going to, but—"

"Just one second," he interrupted. "You've got to know this first, before you say anything. I've been out, haven't telephoned her, or taken her anywhere or anything since mother's operation when Lella collapsed. Remember?"

I nodded with a vivid memory flash of his gentle wife's tortured face. "You ought to know I wouldn't do anything to hurt Lella—especially now"—he added significantly—"and I don't intend to go near Bess again. But I can't be rude to her, can I, when she comes to the office as she did today, or calls me up? She's always been a corking friend to us all, and it looks like pretty small potatoes to—"

"A Corking Pest!"

"She's been a corking pest!" I exploded, but careful to keep my voice discreetly lowered. "It's time you knew the truth. Alf—if you weren't as blind as a bat you'd have seen it long ago. Bess Dean isn't particularly unprincipled, nor is she wicked. She simply is vanity mad, and she isn't capable of any emotion for anyone. But she would sacrifice anything almost to gratify her vanity and feed a grudge. She has an old account with me, and she tried once again, signally failed, to hurt me through Dicky. It sounds rather comical to say that she tried to hurt Lella through you because she knew I loved Lella, but I am sure that was her original motive. And as long as she can bamboozle you into believing her a good friend whose feelings it would be disloyal to hurt, you can wager your hat cent she is going to do everything she can to prove to—"

"I know all about it," I interpolated, to keep the amusement from my voice—Alfred was boyishly transparent in his mental foundering. "Then you know, too, that there wasn't any harm in it," he retorted quickly. "Lella wouldn't have objected if I'd taken you, for instance, around as much as I did Bess."

Club President

Lella that the old intimacy exists. If you really want to save Lella heartache at this critical time, you'll make it clear to Miss Dean that her presence is unwelcome if you have to tell her flatly, and forbid her coming to your office or telephoning you. I'll warrant you that you'll get a glimpse of the real nature behind that good-comrade exterior when you do."

The train was drawing into the station. I gathered my cloak about me and rose, Alfred springing to his feet beside me.

"You don't need to take my word alone for all this," I said, as we made our way to the door, "although I believe you will do me the justice to say that you never have heard me—what is it you say, wield the hammer?—on any acquaintance before. But I think, if you ask Dicky flatly he will corroborate every word I've said."

W. C. T. U. Essay Contest.

Stromburg, Neb.—The climax of the essay contest carried on by the Women's Christian Temperance union came at a mass meeting of all the churches with the announcement of the winners.

Those winning in the contest were: Helen Lund from the high school, Margaret Norman, eighth grade; Charlotte Norman, seventh grade; Edwin Rose, sixth grade, and Stanton Moore, fifth grade. Each winning contestant read their essays and was handed a dollar by Mrs. L. A. Erickson, president of the W. C. T. U.

Art Outlines.

Art as a practical, likable thing, closely related to everyday life, is the subject of an outline for picture study just published by the American Art bureau, and being issued to women's clubs in many parts of the country.

The American Art bureau has as its object the promotion of art for the public, and is endorsed in its work by many of the great public art museums of the country, by the American Federation of Arts and by club women of the country. This study outline, recently presented at a meeting of 100 art chairmen from the Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs was accepted by them as valuable, and the offer of the Art bureau to co-operate with this department of the federation was accepted.

Pictures in their relation to the problems of home furnishing are studied in this course; and supplementary to it is a lecture illustrated with slides, on "Pictures in Home Decoration."

A portion of the outline is devoted to American art and artists, and appended to the entire study course is a list of many of those reproductions of famous originals which are obtainable in excellent prints, worthy of hanging in the home and school, and beautiful in any home-furnishing scheme of which they are a part. Here is shown what a wide range of beautiful reproductions, examples of the best in art, are now obtainable at small cost.

There are also sections of the outline in the early classics, including Greek and Roman art and artists; Italian primitives; the work of the great masters of every country; European art of the 19th century, and modern painting up to the present time. There is "A Study in Personalities," touching on the part which each of the well-known moderns has played in the development of art.

Fairmont Mothers and Daughters Dined.

Fairmont, Neb., March 14.—The annual mothers and daughters banquet, sponsored by Fairmont Commercial club, was held in the Odd Fellows hall. One hundred and seventy-four plates were served by the young men waiting on the mothers and daughters. Mrs. A. P. Stewart acted as toastmistress. Mrs. Leroy Davis of Lincoln was introduced as the speaker of the evening, with the subject, "Woman's Responsibilities as a Citizen."

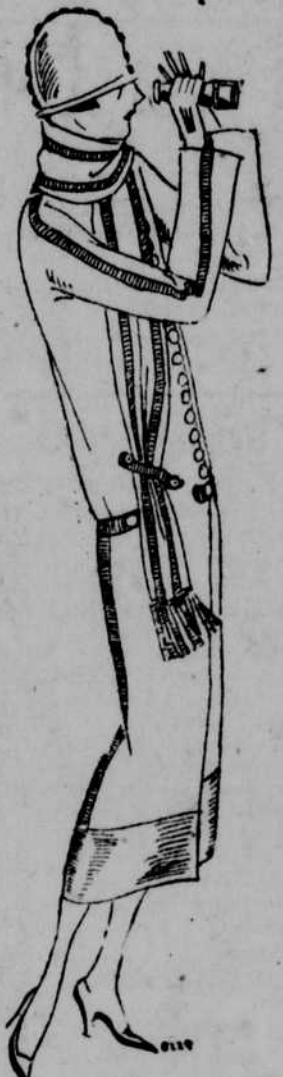

Arborville Woman's Club Active.

York, Neb., March 14.—Arborville, which claims the distinction of having the oldest woman's club in the county, is studying national problems, child welfare, and working for community projects.

The Sports Mode

By ELEANOR GUNN.

Although season in and season out at Palm Beach there are certain style characteristics in common, it must be admitted that the sports theme has been played to an extraordinary degree, his year, even at a resort which seems to call primarily for sports clothes. Last winter, chiffons and crepes were noted not only at the Coconut Grove and smart teas elsewhere, but on the sands during the noon hour. This season, we have to color, although as usual white leads. It is difficult to tell just why this is, because bright and even pale colors are lovely here. The only tones which really seem out of their element are the deep shades of black, unless as a complement to white or navy with white used in the same proportion. There is a good deal of white with black this season, and curiously enough in printed effects, for with these and a few other exceptions, prints are not of any particular importance.

The exceptions are for bathing suits and beach capes, scarfs and certain Japanese crepes with scenic effects. This print is repeated many times and in various colors here, at Miami, and Havana. Most of the black and white effects result from appliques of black on white, but there are a few very large black motifs on white crepe. While last season we would have been at a loss to have been without a chiffon gown or two, this season we can get along very comfortably without chiffon for daywear. While it is very popular by night, it is not indispensable, owing largely to the fact that it has not been necessary to consider coolness and comfort in the selection of our dance frocks. Fur bordered brocades and velvets are not amiss these chilly nights.

If comparisons are sometimes made they are often illustrative. It is perhaps, easier to visualize the current mode by contrasting the woollens and crepes, the satins and general avoidance of transparency this season with diaphanous qualities of last. The trend is all toward trim, well-cut and well-tailored lines and sports wear is more important today than since the time we learned to conjure with the term.

High School Play Nets $200 at Holdrege

Holdrege, Neb., March 14.—The athletic and commercial departments of the high school held a Mardi Gras at the high school here Tuesday night at which they made about $200. The money will be used to help defray the expenses of the basketball team to the state tournament and to send the commercial contestants to the district tournament.
