

Coolidge Issue Worries Senate; Fear Reprimand

Executive May Order Mellon to Keep Silent; Thus Raise Third Issue.

Washington, D. C., April 29.—The senate is troubled about the issue Coolidge has raised. They believe the senate weaker than the president with the country. One-third the senate, 22, almost equally divided between republicans and democrats, is coming up for reelection this year. Their apprehension is bipartisan. Already, some of the most powerful senators have lost in the early primaries. The senate would like to renege itself in public esteem. They would like to act to safeguard themselves against Coolidge's rebuke to congress, concerning failure to act on the income tax before March 15, date of other legislation, and the way they are conducting some of their investigations.

They are apprehensive also about the courts. Already, two actions of the senate investigations are under review and there is a widespread uneasiness lest Coolidge may raise a third issue. It is believed that if the senate committee investigating Mellon refuses to conform to law and reason, Coolidge may do as Cleveland did, order his cabinet officer to refuse to give testimony and documents the senate demands. Beneath the truculent bluffing from some senators, there is a cautious intention to set themselves right. The courts are now reviewing the effort to convict Sinclair for contempt and the similar proposal to put Daugherty and his brother in contempt for their refusal to allow access to the books of Daugherty's bank.

Senatorial Investigation Improper

The ultimate purpose of an investigation of a cabinet official, if he be found culpable, is to impeach him, and, in an impeachment proceeding, it is the senate that sits as the court. This being so, it is held to be improper for the senate to conduct the preliminary investigation. The constitution provides that in impeachment proceedings, the lower house shall first make the charges, and thereafter the senate shall act as judge. For this reason there is apprehension that the senate may be exceeding its powers.

In the case of the committee investigating Mellon, one of the best lawyers in the senate, who is sympathetic to the investigation, believes the committee is exceeding even such power as the senate gave it. The resolution gives the committee power to acquire information with a view to amending some of the tax laws. The committee has gone beyond that and is investigating Mellon's fitness for office, which function is in the nature of looking toward impeachment and properly belongs to the lower house.

Feeling with Mellon. To impugn lack of personal integrity to Mellon would be a joke if it were not an outrage. It is believed that a good many things in the income tax department have been done badly, and that there should be no limitation of revealing conditions in the department. The general feeling is that Mellon has administered the department, which is about one-tenth of all his duties, exceptionally well. Mellon inherited an incredible mass of confusion and arrears of work, due to the sudden expansion of the department. It is felt that whatever trouble there is in the income tax situation is due wholly to congress, because congress wrote the income tax law making inevitable confusion and irregularity.
