

Stockmen Urge State Control of Cattle Imports

Advocate Bonding Dealers in Dairy Cattle and Regulation Through System of Permits.

Lincoln, Neb., April 22.—Stockmen of the state believe effective means to stop the importation of "fake" dairy cattle into Nebraska are contained in a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Nebraska Improved Livestock Breeders, the Nebraska Dairywomen's association, the Nebraska Farm Bureau and the Nebraska Dairy Development society. The resolution follows:

"We, the various associations interested in the welfare of Nebraska's livestock, feel that the State department of Agriculture should rigidly enforce the existing regulations and such new regulations as permit complete control of any dairy and breeding cattle imported into the State.

"In addition, we feel that there is urgent and immediate need for a system of registration and control through permits for all persons introducing cattle into the state and if possible that a legal method of bonding dealers in dairy cattle be adopted.

"By the above it would be possible to obtain a complete check as to the origin and final disposition of every animal brought into the state. Because of the emergency existing at the present time on the western coast this is doubly important. We appreciate the control work at present under way and offer the state department our closest co-operation in putting further regulations into effect."

The meeting was called because it was asserted unscrupulous dealers have been taking advantage of the dairy cattle promotion in Nebraska to go outside the markets, buy canner and cutter stuff and bring them into the state. No action was taken on a proposition to put up the bars for an entire embargo against imported cattle.

DRY AGENTS FAIL IN RAID ON HOME

Agents from Prohibition Director Elmer Thomas' office and city and county officials made an unsuccessful raid Tuesday afternoon on the home of "Dutch" Hendfeldt, 1708 Lake street.

They were called to the place by a collector, who was alarmed by the furore about the place. Without a search warrant they dared not enter the place, but surrounded it. Hendfeldt sat on the porch laughing and inviting them to "Come in."

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

The Story of the Flight of the Harrison Children That Lillian Told Madge.

There is no anger quite so full as that of a woman who has followed the slandering of a telephone receiver upon a recent one has ready for utterance.

For the first few seconds after Dicky had rebuffed my softly spoken apology, I stood staring silently, gazing at only one thing, that Lillian had asserted herself from my room, and therefore he must have heard my at least to me humble plea.

Then the recollection of many other hectic episodes in my life with my temperamental husband came to me, and my anger; from me replaced by a tremulous smile. Dicky the Tempestuous might be so angry that he would refuse an apology for the moment, but Dicky, the chivalric, never could rest until he had made amends for his rashness. I should hear from him again before very long. Of that I was very sure.

I went to the door, and called Lillian softly from the kitchen where she had gone when she turned the telephone receiver over to me. Characteristically, she made no reference to Dicky.

"We Aim to Please."

"I'm bread pudding from the neck up," she said, as she began unfurling her gown, "but I must tell you about the children before I go to bed. You certainly provide entertainment for your guests, Madge. I haven't had a second to speak of the children until now."

"We aim to please," I said demurely, and she grinned appreciatively.

"You know me, don't you?" she acknowledged, and I nodded as she went to the bedroom and brought out Dicky's bathrobe.

"This is first aid to the injured," I laughed, "or rather to the ladies who didn't have an opportunity to bring luggage with them. I already have found comfort within it tonight. Take off your dress and slip into this while you talk. You'll be more comfortable."

"I'm doing that little thing as fast as I can," she retorted, and in another minute she was wrapped in the bathrobe and ensconced in my easiest chair before the grate while I replenished the fire.

"Dicky certainly knows what's comfortable," she announced, smuggling down into the Indian robe, and luxuriously stretching her toes toward the fire. "And this sure is some contrast to Flushing Bay and the East River tonight."

I alighted at the picture her words suggested, but I did not answer her, knowing the quickest way to get the story I was so anxious to hear.

"It was a hectic time while it lasted," she began with a reminiscent little scowl, "but fortunately it didn't last long enough to shatter Mrs. Braithwaite's nerves. The children, bless their hearts, thought it was good fun. Of course, they didn't realize what we were up against, and Dr. Braithwaite has seen too many emergencies to be daunted by anything. But I felt sorry for your sister-in-law. It was something so entirely foreign to the sheltered existence she has led, that I was afraid it would bowl her over. But she was game. I'll say that for her. I didn't think it was in her."

Lillian's Story.

There was in her voice a genuine note of admiration, a feeling which I knew had triumphed over Lillian's frequently expressed dislike of Harriet Braithwaite because of my friend's essential justice.

"You know those other fellows had a motor boat, didn't you?"

"Yes," I answered. "It started a little after ours."

"The captain of our bigger boat put me wise," she rejoined. "Of course he didn't know for certain that the second boat was trying to trail us. But he could tell by the sounds that they were both heading for us. And while we knew the one with the children would reach us first, it was a question whether we could transfer them and get off before the detective's boat caught up to us."

"But the captain was a whiz," she said admiringly, "and he got the thing through with a bang. We were on our way before the smaller boat got there, but not quickly enough to get out of sight of the people on board her. And they were trailed us over the face of the water. If it had been daylight I'd have the map of Flushing Bay and the upper East River printed on my hand."

"But we finally shook them off and beat it for a safe landing place. The captain had picked out before we started," she went on. "Good old Alf Durkee was there, doing a Casablanca stunt with a big car he'd chartered for the evening, and it wasn't so long afterward that we had our people safely on board their steamer, and had hidden them a hazy farewell. You can wager we didn't linger around to let any stray detective cowboys brand us as we came off. And I'm mighty sure the canny representatives of the Harrison family haven't the slightest idea for which port those children are bound."
