The party plans to spend some time at summer resorts in Virginia, and in visiting Richmond and Old Point Comfort. They return in August.

Your Problems

Martha Allen

Warning.
Dear Martha Allen: I hope this experience will help "Sick at Heart," who doesn't know which one to take. At the age of 16 I went with a man of 27 for four months; then he went away. I thought lots of him, for he was my first real beau and was handsome. We wrote to each other for a while and then stopped.
I then went with another man who was 22 and who later asked me to be his wife. I accepted; then the first man came back. I did not tell him that I was engaged. At parties or anywhere we would meet, we would sit and talk. I could see no harm in it, although I knew it hurt my beloved. Then came a day when my beloved warned me, but I kept on. My love for the second man became cold in the freshness of the first. We broke the engagement and he went his way. Then the first man dropped me cold. At last I awoke to know that my love for the second had never died. So, don't be too quick to throw away the love you have for the attentions of another.

ONE WHO KNOWS.

The above letter was received in good faith and is published with the hope that it may help those with problems to solve. As the writer states, first loves need not always be more lasting than others. Desire for attention from many suitors often ruins any chance for marriage.

Y. W. C. A.

Twelve young women representing Y. W. C. A. high school student clubs left Tuesday morning for Lake Okoboji, Ia., to attend the annual summer conference. Miss Grace McLain, adviser of South High school, went as sponsor and Bible teacher. Others in the party were Miss Madeline Miller, president Central High Student club, and the Misses Vivian Wrenn, Frances Elliott, Wilma McFarland and Lila Showalter. From the Freshmen club, delegates were Miss Margaret Wigton, president, and the Misses Elma Grove, Cora Lavery, and Jean Lavery. Miss Dorothy Scofield, president of Technical High school club, was accompanied by the Misses Elizabeth Lambert and Marie Blankenfeld.

Overseas Service League.

Miss Laura Crandall left Wednesday evening for Kansas City, where she will meet a special train carrying delegates to the annual convention of the Women's Overseas Service League to be held in San Francisco July 12 to 17. Miss Crandall will meet Miss Louis Meneary of Council Bluffs and Miss Edith Martin of Los Angeles, formerly of Omaha, who will represent the Omaha unit at the convention.

The July meeting of the local unit will be held next Sunday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Ella Fleischman Auerbach, 4506 Poppleton avenue. Mrs. Edith Standeven Majors, president, who is spending the summer in Minnesota, will attend the meeting.

Surprise Birthday Party.

A surprise birthday party was held Wednesday evening for Mr. M. E. Haskin, who celebrated his 75th birthday. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Haskin of Missouri Valley, Ia., Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Haskin, Mr. and Mrs. C. Bredenburg and daughter, Grace, Merwin Bredenburg, L. W. Buell, Anna Haskin and Mrs. Haskin.

Zeta Delta Sorority.

Miss Alice Rothwell was elected president of Zeta Delta sorority of Central High school at a meeting held Saturday at the home of Miss Laura Perkins. Other officers elected were: Miss Mary Johnson, vice president; Miss Faye Williams, secretary; Miss Jane Frenzer, treasurer, and Miss Marjorie Gangstad and Miss Jane Wainer, sergeants-at-arms.

At the Elks Club.

Frosted Amber Service.

A glass set, consisting of pitcher, six glasses and a black wicker tray, made a cool looking service for porch use. The amber is frosted. The tray has partitions to hold each glass securely in place.

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

The Natural Question Lillian Strangely Asked Madge.

Knowing that Lillian detests long-winded explanations—indeed, she almost makes a fetish of terseness—I tried to compress to the fewest possible words my story of Mamie and the fur cloaks, which she had wheedled Katie into hiding in our attic, and its bizarre sequel in which Harry Underwood had figured.

Before I had fairly begun she dropped into a chair and cupped her chin in her palms in the characteristic attitude so familiar to me, and for several eternity-like minutes after I had finished she did not relax her attitude.

When she finally rose from the chair, I looked furtively at her mouth. Yes, I had not been mistaken. Etched deeply around it were the tiny lines which always indicate mental stress in my brilliant friend who prides herself upon her ability to control her emotions. Only those who love her, and know her intimately, are able to read the secret of those tiny lines, the only indication her face ever gives that she is disturbed by any problem confronting her.

"How long can I have that girl out there?" She swept her arm toward the living room where Harry Underwood was guarding Mamie.

"As long as you like," I replied promptly. "I made that plain to her before she came with me. But—you'll find her slippery."

"I know," Lillian replied soberly, "but—I think I can put the fear of Allah into her."

"If you can't, the job never will be done," I replied with conviction, but Lillian's "thank you" was so perfunctory that I knew she had heard me only with her sub-consciousness, and she began pacing up and down the room, an emotional outlet she never permits herself unless with some one who knows her as well as I do. Suddenly she stopped and faced me.

"Don't get so worrying over this," she said, and there was no need for her to mention Dicky's name. She knew that creeping in sinister fashion along the tortuous paths of my thoughts was the insistent little query as to Dicky's possible innocent, chivaric but disastrous involvement with Mollie Fawcett's only too patent responsibility for the costly fur cloaks. "This new development of yours hasn't complicated matters any," she went on. "Instead, I think it has simplified things, although there's quite a bit of work ahead of me. Still, if you can lend me your apartment a little longer—"

Lillian Is Worried.
She smiled a bit wanly at me, and I gave her the warm assenting nod which I knew was all the answer she wished. That there was something on her mind other than the problem of the furs was plain, and I had a shrewd surmise as to its nature. I was not surprised, therefore, when she gave me a soul-probing look from her still-beautiful eyes, and asked quietly, but with a curious little effect of breathlessness:

"Madge, what do you think of Harry's connection with this? How does it happen that he is able to make chess pawns out of the desperate men you described as belonging to the gang of bootleggers who nearly did for you? Do you think—"

She paused uncertainly, and I finished the question for her and gave her my answer promptly. There never is any use beating about the bush with Lillian.

"That he is their leader? I do not see what other conclusion there can be. Do you?"

"No—o—o. There was hesitation in her manner, something rare with her. "And yet—one never can tell about Harry. He reveals in the name without the game" as a melodrama-loving small boy might.

"I do not think he has ever recovered from the experience he had as the young son of a particularly rigid clergyman," she said. "As a boy, Harry used to smuggle Old Cap Celiere and the rest into the house, but they were always discovered and confiscated before he finished reading them. When he was grown he used to browse around second-hand book stores and collect all those old things. But he always mourned the fact that some of them he never found, and never could know the ending."

"A Dime-Novel Complex."
Harry had a regular dime-novel complex if anybody ever possessed one," she smiled, "and I think most of the bizarre things he does are due to it. I had so hoped, however, that he was going straight. It's utterly absurd, I know, but I never can help the feeling that I am somehow responsible for him, and if he is mixed up with this criminal gang I—"

As of moved by some remembrance, she looked down at her hands which still clutched the letter at which she had gazed so intently when she had taken the mail from the letter-box.

She had laid the rest of the envelopes upon the table when she entered the living room, but unobtrusively had kept this one. I did not need the sight of the beautiful, old-fashioned chirography to know the writer, although the script was familiar to me.

Robert Saverin had penned the letter which Lillian had not read.
